It may seem strange that the Rev. HUGH PRICE HUGHES, considering certain recent passages, did not employ himself in considering "The Ninth Commandment in all its Bearings," with particular reference to the Aquarium licence. He may have had his reasons for avoiding this subject, and yet, as we shall see, he practically touched it. To him, it appears, the language of the Bishop seems "not only awful, but comic." That "a well-paid officer of the State," a person "possessing a palace and five thousand a year," should talk thus seemed to Mr. HUGHES a matter requiring the instant resignation of the Bishop, who "held his place in the House of Lords on the theory that he was there to teach our legislators to administer [we were not aware that legislators administered] in harmony with the principles of our national religion." Who taught Mr. HUGHES this "theory" we do not know; perhaps it was the gentleman who knew the young lady who recently—that is to say, two years ago—received a document which has not been proved to have had any existence. But, speaking as persons moderately acquainted with English history and constitutional law, as well as pretty strong defenders of the presence of bishops in Parliament, we can assure Mr. HUGHES that his theory and the Aquarium invitation are, as far as proofs go, on a par. His application, however, seems to have been even more interesting than his theory. Mr. BRIGHT and Mr. COBDEN thought differently from the Bishop: therefore the Bishop was wrong. Mr. RUSKIN did not agree with the Bp.: therefore the Bp. was wrong. Mr. HERBERT SPENCER did not agree with the Bp.: therefore the Bp. was wrong. Here we can only admire Mr. HUGHES's logic. But it is still more interesting to find him in fresh difficulties with that troublesome Commandment. For he charged Dr. MAGEE with "confessing the practical impossibility of obeying CHRIST." Now Dr. MAGEE had not confessed anything of the sort. He had said that States, as States, could not adopt the principles of action which are incumbent on Christian individuals as Christian individuals—which is a perfectly different thing, and one which, we may add, has never, till the present reign of cant, been denied by any but a few crack-brained fanatics, not usually remarkable for Christian orthodoxy. We do not care to argue the point, which would be simply to argue that the Golden Rule forbids resistance to a robber, a murderer, or a ravisher, because the robber, murderer, and ravisher would, ex hypothesi, wish for a non-resisting victim. But it certainly is interesting to find Mr. HUGHES still in difficulty with that Commandment.

THE HISTORY OF A BANKNOTE.

THE famous "Adventures of a Guinea" were less important, if more amusing, than the biography of a banknote as told, not for the first time, in the Queen's Bench Division last Saturday. The plaintiff was the administrator of an estate, the defendants were the Governor and Company of the Bank of England. The plaintiff asked for a thousand pounds in payment of a Bank of England note for that amount, and the defendants asked to see the note. The reply was that the note had been lost, or, at all events, like the ship's kettle, which went to the bottom of the sea, could not be found. But, whereas everybody knew where that kitchen utensil was, the whereabouts of a document entitling the holder to live like a gentleman for a year remains a mystery. It disappeared ten years ago, and, though notes be so gay that they remain "out" for thirty years, these are usually humble "fivers" and "tenners." As ARISTOTLE, or an equally wise man, observes, one must assume something. Even the Bank of England assumes that all its notes will not be presented on the same day, and the old lady of Threadneedle Street might fairly have speculated on this particular bit of paper not being handed over her counter in this world. But the old lady is not of a speculative turn, and refused to be content with negative evidence. Mr. Justice FIELD and Mr. Justice MANISTY both ventured on the expression of a positive opinion that the note had been lost, meaning, we suppose, that it is no longer in presentable existence, and cannot, therefore, be presented. The Bank appeared to think that somebody wanted to cheat them, whether by lulling them into a false sense of security, or by holding over for a rise, in the hope that amid the confusions of Bimetallism this particular form of money would go up to a premium. The whole of the case suggests the good old academic inquiry, What is a banknote? Most people are content to regard it as a promise to pay. The late Mr. BONAMY PRICE was dissatisfied with the commonplace answer, which did, perhaps, give an unfair advantage to the happy possessor of Mr. MAY's signature, and would almost dance about the lecture-room with delight when an old stager, who knew the ropes, called out "evidence of a debt." If the debt can be proved in other ways, as it could in GILLET v. The Bank of England, then the particular form of evidence which is so much the most satisfactory may be dispensed with. So the plaintiff got his new note, and the fate of the note remains obscure.

Banknotes for 1,000*l.* are not so common but what the adventures of this one may be worth a brief narration. They connect themselves with a sad tale of the dangers incurred by inheriting a fortune. EDWARD GILLET, the last owner of the subject of this memoir, was a bricklayer, who, in his old age, became possessed of considerable wealth. Thereupon he followed the example of the man who was told that the authenticity of the Three Heavenly Witnesses had been disproved, and "took to drinking." In December 1879 he received the note as part of his legacy, and kept it in his pocket a month. The pocket of an elderly drunkard is no place for a respectable note to remain in; and at the end of the month this specimen of portable property took its flight. At the time of the escape GILLET was helplessly intoxicated; and he spent the evening of his days in Darenth Asylum. Mr. GILLET is described by his daughter, with filial insight and candour, as "childish, self-willed, obstinate, and hardly ever sober." He was in the habit of "flourishing the note about"; and the only wonder is that it was not speedily flourished into the pocket of somebody else. The son gave the number to the police, the note was stopped at the Bank, and nothing more has been heard of it from that day to this. At last the GILLETTS have succeeded in getting another. The Bank kindly offered to invest a thousand pounds for them in Consols and pay them the interest. But the Bills of Exchange Act, passed in 1822, gives the public better terms than these. It provides that where a banknote has been lost, the holder may obtain a similar one by giving an indemnity in case the note should turn up and should have to be cashed. This the GILLETTS were willing to do, and the Bank has therefore been ordered to pay them the sum demanded. This is obviously fair, for nobody loses, whereas if the plaintiff had failed, there would have been a dead loss to the family of a thousand pounds. Mr. Justice DENMAN at the trial directed a nonsuit on the extraordinary ground that the whole matter was in the dark. If a jury be good for anything, it must surely be the proper tribunal to interpret doubtful or conflicting facts. Mr. Justice DENMAN would not easily find twelve intelligent men to share his hesitation over so simple a story.

THE MARYBOROUGH TRIALS.

IF the issues at stake in the Maryborough trials had not been so discreditably complicated in some English minds with partisan considerations, it is to be supposed that the net result of these judicial proceedings would have been, in England at any rate, regarded with satisfaction. That justice has exacted full retribution for the savage and cowardly crime committed in the chapelyard at Gweedore is not, of course, to be contended. Somewhere or other among that flock of Father M'FADDEN's—the individual members of which he seems to show so strangely unshepherd-like an inability to recognize—there must be one or more men whose consciences tell them that they are murderers, not in the moral sense of the word only, but according to its strict legal meaning. That is to say, they must know that blows sufficient to destroy life—and one of which must actually have destroyed it—were delivered by them upon the prostrate body of District Inspector MARTIN; and we will add that, though they may have, under the peculiar circumstances, a natural delicacy in communicating this fact to the reverend Father at the confessional, their guilt will probably become, if it be not now, as well known to the country-side as if they had confessed it in the market-place. That there are men living who should have been hanged for their share in this brutal business is undoubtedly true; and the fact that these men, whoever they are, have escaped, would, in a healthier state of English party opinion, have been universally deplored. Nevertheless, it would be unreasonable to feel any serious disappointment at their escape. The principal actors in such a scene of bestial fury as that in which the murdered man—the "suicide," as the gentle Mr. LABOUCHERE has called him—had his life battered out of him are almost sure to be indistinguishable from their fellows by the objects of their attack; and, when it was found impossible to bring home anything more than the crime of manslaughter to the first prisoner who was placed in the dock, it became pretty certain on the evidence that none of them were likely to be convicted on the capital charge. This being so, it was certainly better that the convictions on minor charges should have been obtained as they have been under pleas of Guilty than that the cases should have been tried out to verdict. The confessions of the prisoners at least ensure us against the possibility of any mistakes on the part of identifying witnesses, and the public will be quite willing to compound for a little extra leniency in the sentences in order to obtain assurance on that head.

As to the sentences themselves, which the Parnellites, followed in slightly milder terms by the Gladstonian press, are already denouncing as "barbarous"—although they have been beslaving with flatteries which were really insults, if those delicate-minded persons had only known it, the Judge by whom these sentences were apportioned—we have no particular fault to find with them. It is certain that the offence of a criminal who is seen in the act of striking a prostrate man, afterwards taken up dead or in a dying state, approaches as closely to murder, even in the legal sense, as it is possible for manslaughter to do; and the sentence of ten years' penal servitude passed upon COLL for such a crime as this is certainly very far from excessive. The same observation applies to the cases of PATRICK ROARTY and DOMINICK ROGERS, whose position in fact, except in so far as it was modified by their plea of Guilty, was scarcely distinguishable from that of COLL. They get off cheaply, in our opinion, with their seven years of penal servitude, as does CONNELL M'GEE with his sentence of five, and the other prisoners—every one of whom, to the least active among them, deserves a lesson—with their various terms of imprisonment.

As to Father M'FADDEN himself, his own plea of Guilty to the fourth count of the indictment against him is the best reply to all the Gladstonian bluster about the "enormity" of arraigning him in the first instance on graver charges. His submission to judgment on the charge of obstructing the police is a confession of legal guilt in respect of one offence, which of itself involved him in distinct responsibility, certainly moral, and possibly legal, for the terrible crime to which it directly led. The course of the inquiry went to show that no responsibility of the legal description could be brought home to him; but his moral responsibility remains exactly where it was, and it is shocking to find Englishmen of high pretensions to morality and religion displaying so callous an indifference to the plainest ethical considerations of the case. Father M'FADDEN's defiance of the law—which he has Scriptural injunction to obey, but which he himself confesses to having resisted—has led to the cruel murder of one of his fellow-creatures. The Executive were not only justified in inquiring, but bound to inquire, to what extent his initial unlawful act had implicated him in legal liability for its resulting crime. It is found that no such legal liability attaches to him, and Father M'FADDEN returns home to his cure exempt from legal penalty, but with a moral guilt attaching to him for which, as a priest, he ought to prescribe penance to his soul, if not to his body, for the remainder of his days. Yet the Christian partisans of Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. PARNELL in this country appear to think that the feelings appropriate to the occasion should consist wholly of "indignation" at Father M'FADDEN's trial, and of exultation at what they foolishly call "Mr. BALFOUR's defeat."

LORD HARTINGTON AT WOLVERHAMPTON.

LORD HARTINGTON was not amongst those who doubted whether the later extensions of the suffrage would be a public good, and yet few men have occasion to regret them more. Liberal as he may be, it is not in the nature of him to depart from the belief that public affairs should be decided by knowledge, reason, and justice alone; with no more concession to prejudiced ignorance, however passionate, or even to the expediences of party management, than seems downright compulsory. When he speaks to the general public, it must be in the same language that he would address to a senatorial Chamber; or if not in the same language, then at any rate with the same arguments and to the same effect. He feels, of course, that it is no disadvantage to kindle an enthusiasm of personal devotion, and is as well aware as other politicians that no statesman can hope to do much in our day without a preponderance of brute votes at his back. But for Lord HARTINGTON there is only one way of addressing the popular mind—by appeal to reason, and to those considerations of the general good which are the foundation of law, the better part of patriotism, and the only defence against social warfare and the disintegrations of anarchy. This puts Lord HARTINGTON, and all men like him, at a great disadvantage when they have no longer to address a certain number of minds more or less educated, more or less warned by observation and inference against the danger of yielding to the persuasions of sentiment or the incitements of selfishness. In effect, they have now to move “the mob”; and to do so in competition with men who are content to draw the mob behind them by whatever is most likely to work upon their prejudices, their passions, and their uninstructed notions of self-interest.

Look at the speech which Lord HARTINGTON delivered at Wolverhampton lately, mark its limitations, and say what its actual effect is likely to be in deciding what we must still call the great question of the day. It was a reasoning speech from end to end. As such it was most admirable. Its one great defect was the fault of the courteous, high-minded controversialist, who, with a candour that may pass into excess, takes up the argument of his adversary as something that will be abandoned if it can be refuted. At this his adversary smiles, of course; but, careless of that, your Lord HARTINGTON goes on with his refutation, step by step, to the end. In this case it is a necessary thing to do, no doubt; and it is well that it should be thoroughly done. But when the exposition is complete, what then? It has touched the more instructed and dispassionate intelligence of the country, strengthening and confirming it; but the speaker himself can hardly hope by this time that “our masters,” who have their own prophets, will be much affected by it. The main point of Lord HARTINGTON’s argument was that the Gladstonian statesmen have never defined what they mean by Home Rule—that is to say, what they mean by it now; and this he made perfectly clear for the twentieth time. In truth, there is no definition of Home Rule for Ireland before the world; nobody can say what Mr. GLADSTONE and his friends propose to make of it; but the cry goes up as loudly as ever for the unknown and unconceived! When such a state of things has lasted, with full light upon it, for a year or two, we may fairly suppose ourselves confronted by a something that laughs at reason, as love is said to laugh at locksmiths. Passing from the general to particulars, Lord HARTINGTON dwelt at some length upon one great change which Mr. GLADSTONE is supposed to have made in his Home Rule scheme. In 1886 he said:—“I think it perfectly clear that, if Ireland is given a domestic Legislature, Irish peers and Irish representatives cannot come here to control English and Scotch affairs. That I understand to be admitted freely. I never heard the Irish urge the contrary. There cannot be a domestic Legislature in Ireland dealing with Irish affairs, and Irish peers and Irish representatives sitting in Parliament in Westminster to take part in English and Scotch affairs.” But the proposal to exclude the Irish members from the Imperial Parliament proved very unpopular indeed, and for good reasons. Therefore, it is said, Mr. GLADSTONE intends now to do what he described as impossible, and retain the Irish representatives in Westminster while conferring a “domestic Legislature” on Ireland. In other words, his substitute for an intolerable reconstruction of legislative authority is another more intolerable still, and one that was by himself pronounced absurd. Both plans were again examined by Lord HARTINGTON in public; and, in the coolest, most logical, and conclusive manner, he showed that if the one was too impracticable for endurance the other would prove merely destructive of the whole Parliamentary constitution of the country. His argument will never be answered; but, when it had come to an end, Lord HARTINGTON must have been sadly conscious that, for all the effect it will have on the minds of his political opponents, it might as well have been a lecture on the moon. The followers of Mr. GLADSTONE are no more likely to ask him for explanation or reply than to cease shouting for Home Rule till they know what they are shouting about. There was one passage in Lord HARTINGTON’s address, however, which must have a good effect generally; for no convincing expression of sincerity and courage fails to make its mark on the public mind. This was where he rejected all fellowship with men “to whom success at the polls is everything, and to whom the justice of their cause, the patriotism of the cause in which they are engaged, are matters of comparatively small significance. . . . For us who acted on our own judgment, without considering whether we should find ourselves in a majority at the polls in the next election or not, I cannot admit that there is any cause for depression, much less for any change of conduct. Our votes will be given in opposition to the return to power of what we consider a Separatist Government, and it can make to us in the future no more difference than it has made in the past whether our efforts are to be crowned with ultimate success or not.” There spoke the man of character; and character still counts for much all the country through.

When we come toward the end of this speech of Lord HARTINGTON’s we find newer matter; and it is to be hoped that more will be heard of it from the Unionist side in politics. His Lordship remarked on the fact that the issue of the recent elections did not by any means turn exclusively on the question of Home Rule. He cited the admissions of Mr. ATHERLEY JONES, Mr. RUSSELL, and other Radicals, that the masses in this country are but little stirred by the wrongs and woes of Ireland; and that if the great heart of the people is to be warmed to enthusiasm for the Liberal party, the Liberal party must weep less over Mitchelstown and more over the lot of the shopkeeper, the artisan, the tenant-farmer, and the agricultural labourer nearer home. Beyond all doubt they are right, and to a certainty their counsels will prevail. Lord HARTINGTON is of opinion, indeed, that it is not possible for the leaders of the Opposition party—“at all events at present”—to put every institution in the country up to auction for purchase by votes, or to promise the indiscriminate satisfaction of any demand made by any class in the country. Yet he thinks “their promises indicate a tendency in that direction.” He marks what Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT had to say on this subject a little while ago, and how shrewdly that statesman opines that, if ground-rents, leaseholds, &c., are judiciously handled, “these things will help Home Rule and Home Rule will help these things.” It is certainly not too soon to take account of such devices, and even to meet them with something more than denunciation. Lord HARTINGTON pleads that questions of disestablishment, of land-law reform, free education, rating, ground-rents, leaseholds, and the rest of it, should not be so treated as to import into the highest regions of statesmanship the arts of the log-roller, or be turned into baits and bribes. He thinks that these subjects—“worthy of consideration and some of them ripe for settlement”—ought not to become a matter of traffic and sale. No, nor should the “settlement” of them become a matter of competition between the Ins and the Outs, either now or when the days of the next general election draw nigh. Amongst others, Lord HARTINGTON, we hope, will see to that; keeping well in mind, under all temptations, that “success at the polls is not everything.”

MR. MORLEY’S EVASIONS.

IT appears from the opening sentence of Mr. MORLEY’s speech at Bristol the other day that he was under an engagement, or half-engagement, of two years’ standing to deliver a speech to the faithful in that city. Perhaps, therefore, he felt that his visit could not be longer deferred, and has paid it just at this moment rather as a matter of necessity than of choice. At any rate, we are willing to assume as much, in order to save Mr. MORLEY’s judgment in the selection of times and seasons; for assuredly, if there ever were a time when silence would have served him better than speech, or better than any speech which he was in the least likely to have leave to make, that time is the present. We must, however, regretfully admit that Mr. MORLEY’s judgment, as illustrated in this very speech at Colston Hall, rather severely taxes the indulgence of the critic who would think and speak well of it. What, for instance, is to be thought of the discretion of the controversialist who undertook to answer the Mr. CHAMBERLAIN of to-day by quoting the speeches of the Mr. CHAMBERLAIN of the past? It is no business of ours to dispute the effectiveness of the process; but for Mr. MORLEY to resort to it, of all people in the world, and against, of all people in the world, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN! Why to do so was simply to invite the reminder that this is precisely the process which Mr. CHAMBERLAIN has recently applied with a simply destructive effect in the case of Mr. MORLEY himself. Nothing that the member for Newcastle can possibly unearth from the platform-record of the member for West Birmingham could by any possibility rival in disastrousness that one quotation which the member for West Birmingham quoted the other day to an astonished world from the platform-record of the member for Newcastle. To show that Mr. CHAMBERLAIN had once used hard words of "Coercion," and words inconsistent with his present views as to the necessity of enforcing obedience to the law in Ireland, can surprise no one. Everybody must have known that utterances of that kind could be brought up against him. There is nothing in Mr. MORLEY's showing that Mr. CHAMBERLAIN was once an "anti-Coercionist." But what of that terrible quotation whereby Mr. CHAMBERLAIN showed that Mr. MORLEY was once an anti-Home Ruler? That was indeed a blow to the Separatists, who had imagined—as, indeed, had most Unionists too—that, whatever record leaped to light, he never could be shamed. For, if it were too much to say that he was shamed by the record which leaped to light in Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's speech of a few weeks ago, it is certainly true that it reduced him to a very much less dignified position than he had formerly occupied. There is nothing, we fear, in the dossier of any of Mr. MORLEY's most vulnerable adversaries which can compare for compromising effect with that unlucky declaration of his to the electors of Westminster. "I will not vote for a separate Parliament for Ireland; and I will not vote for any measure or proposition or inquiry which could lead it to be supposed that this is an open question in my mind." On the whole, we think that Mr. MORLEY acted wisely, if a little theatrically, in tearing up the paper which he held in his hand after reading from it one passage expository of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's earlier opinions. Had he torn it up without reading anything from it at all, he would have acted more wisely still.

In this matter, in fact, Mr. MORLEY went out of his way to make a mistake. That the mistake of delivering any speech on Home Rule at all at this particular juncture was an equally gratuitous one we do not say. Indeed, we have already suggested as a possible excuse for it that the orator may have felt himself compelled to fulfil a platform engagement which could not be deferred. Otherwise the moment was certainly a most inopportune one for breaking silence. For Mr. MORLEY must, or should have been, well aware that the extremely awkward questions with which the Unionist leaders have been so persistently plying Mr. GLADSTONE and his lieutenants of late are addressed to none of these officers so pointedly as to himself. Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, with that incapacity for self-valuation in terms of public opinion which sometimes makes men as ridiculous as a positive lack of humour, has taken the lead in protesting against being "catechized" as to the principles of the newest new Gladstonian Home Rule. The notion of anybody's thinking it worth while to catechize Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT on such a point as this will provoke a smile even from Sir WILLIAM's colleagues. He may rest assured that no sensible Unionist is the victim of so idle a curiosity as could alone suggest such an inquiry. His resolute refusal to answer will be met with the most cheerful acquiescence on the part of his political opponents. Even if they had the old machinery of the torture-chamber at their disposal, they could not possibly think his evidence of sufficient value to justify them in "putting him to the question." But Mr. MORLEY's position is a very different one. Whatever he may have thought or said on the subject of Home Rule in the days to which Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's inconvenient memory goes back, he is at least known to have held at least one very definite opinion with regard to it within a very recent period of time. He was firmly convinced at the time when Mr. GLADSTONE's Bill was introduced that Ireland ought to be excluded under the Home Rule arrangement from representation in the Imperial Parliament, and he even went so far as to recommend Mr. GLADSTONE's Bill to acceptance on the express ground of its effecting that exclusion. Since then, however, it has been more or less ambiguously hinted by Mr. GLADSTONE that this provision will or may form no part of his revised Home Rule scheme; and what the leader will do no more than ambiguously hint has been lately put with considerably greater plainness and precision by one of the most important of his colleagues. Lord SPENCER's declaration on this subject, moreover, contains other matter to be dealt with by Mr. MORLEY. For Lord SPENCER not only makes it clear enough that what Mr. MORLEY once regarded as the chief merit of the Home Rule scheme is to disappear from it, but he also pretty clearly indicates one at least of the persons to whom it originally owed this element of value. It was, in the first instance, "taken as a matter of course," he said, "that the Irish members should be retained at Westminster"; and it was only on discussion, after the Cabinet was formed, and after hearing opinions from various people, that they were excluded as they were excluded by Mr. GLADSTONE's Bill.

Now it will not, we suppose, be doubted anywhere that one, and probably not the least influential, of the various people who counselled the exclusion of the Irish members was Mr. MORLEY himself; and what the public, therefore, have a right to know is, whether he has abandoned the opinion for which he thus obtained practical recognition; and if so, why, and with what views as to the scheme of Home Rule which is to be substituted for that which he formerly favoured. With a public, we say, legitimately expecting enlightenment on these points, it will not redound to the credit of Mr. MORLEY's already seriously compromised political reputation that he has made a speech in which these grave questions are only touched upon to be dodged. It is idle for him to suppose that he will be allowed to handle such topics with the irresponsibility justly permitted to Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT. Mr. MORLEY is nothing if not a serious politician, and will lose ground by any speech in which he deals otherwise than seriously with politics. Nor can he, an academic disquisitor on political subjects—if ever such a disquisitor there was—expect to ride off on the pretext that the question as to the form of Home Rule which Mr. GLADSTONE now advocates is a purely academic one. Even if the difference between colonial and federal Home Rule were a difference of a theoretical rather than of a practical kind, it would not be in the mouth of a politician of Mr. MORLEY's stamp to decline the discussion of it on that ground. But as a matter of fact, and as he is well aware, the difference between the two is not merely practical—it is vital. No one knows better than he that, whereas the establishment of a system of colonial Home Rule would primarily and directly affect Ireland alone, while its bearing upon the United Kingdom at large would, however serious, be but secondary and indirect, the establishment of a system of federal Home Rule would in logic presuppose, and in fact necessitate, a revolutionary reconstruction of our whole constitutional arrangements. And, knowing this, he cannot surely intend to advance so preposterous a pretension as that any serious politician who has openly and strenuously advocated the former of those systems of Home Rule, and who now finds it a matter of general belief that his leader and his party are about to adopt the latter, is justified in preserving a blank silence as to his own personal attitude. Either he has or he has not become a convert to the new and revolutionary Home Rule policy which Mr. GLADSTONE announces himself willing to adopt if he finds it necessary to do so, as he would be willing, on a similar proof of necessity, to adopt any other policy which would enable him to regain office. If Mr. MORLEY has become a convert to this policy, it is his manifest duty to the public to acquaint them with the grounds of his conversion. If he remains still unconverted, it is his duty to separate himself formally from the leader and the party who have deviated from what he must still believe to be the true path. The one course which is not open to him to take, without dealing the deathblow to his reputation as a sincere, consistent, and patriotic politician, is that course of evasion and mystification which he is, in fact, pursuing.

LORD DUFFERIN ON INDIA.

IT is hardly a compliment to any roomful of Englishmen to take it for granted that they require to have the value of the British Empire in India pointed out to them; and yet Lord DUFFERIN was right to insist on that theme to his hosts of the London Chamber of Commerce at the Hôtel Metropole. Doubtless, he knew that he would have them with him, and was speaking to others behind them. In any case, he stated in an abundantly luminous way the reasons why those persons who are in the habit of talking of India as a burden should come to an understanding of the folly of their words. Lord DUFFERIN was also absolutely in the right in explaining the deposition of the Maharajah of CASHMERE in terms which showed his firm grasp of the fact that those who are most likely to blame the measure are quite sure to have no knowledge either of the position of that ruler, of the nature of his administration, or of the rights of the Indian Government. The Indian princes whom we protect from such enemies either as NADIR SHAH or as HYDER ALI are under our control. That is true even of the few who can claim to represent ancient Powers. It was doubly true of the Maharajahs of Cashmere, whom we created. The unhappy young man who has just been pensioned off might, but for the action of the British Government after the fall of the Sikh Power, have been nobody and nothing. He would certainly not have been a ruling prince. If, having once set his family up, we could have stood completely neutral between it and its subjects, he would, supposing rebellion had not occurred under his predecessor, have been removed himself by some enterprising gentleman of the HYDER ALI stamp. The badness of his government in sheer imbecility, if not in a more violent way, was notorious, and can only be denied by ignorance. He has to thank us for saving him from the ordinary rough Oriental method of reform. Sentimental people who show some inclination to make a case of oppression out of his deposition forget, or rather do not know, that it is only by the removal of such rulers as he was that the peoples of India can be defended from abominable misrule. It is unnecessary to point out what a danger such a ruler was to our power in India as long as he was in possession of one of the gates of the country. Those who can feel the force of that argument are already some respectable distance on the road to salvation.

Lord DUFFERIN insisted on the value of that power to ourselves in terms of money with great force. This is, perhaps, not the noblest argument for the retention of the Empire, but it has weight, and may be fairly insisted on. A possession with which we do a trade of sixty-four millions, if it is a burden, is one which several of our neighbours would be glad enough to take off our hands. That the trade is dependent on the power is made pretty clear by the example of China. China is as populous as, or more than, India. It possesses what the peninsula never did—a settled Government. The Chinese have the will, and the means, to trade. They have more commerce with us than with any other external Power, and yet it is small compared with the trade of India. In India we can make sure that our goods will not be taxed for protective purposes. There may, it is true, be people who believe that an independent India would have been so well educated in sound principles that it would cling to the benefits of Free-Trade. People have been found to believe that a vote and emancipation would between them turn a negro into a civilized being. To them this proposition may seem credible. It may even impress them as likely that there would be a government in "India" to select Free-Trade as its policy, and not a welter of anarchy. Some, again, there are who would have the virtue to maintain that India should be allowed to take its own way, whatever the consequences might be to our interests. It is very desirable that they should be compelled to make their meaning clear. If it is once well understood, the importance of their activity will, unless human nature has altered marvellously of late, become small indeed. When humanitarian virtue and love of liberty are once well seen to mean loss to the enlightened voter, we shall look to see their popularity shrink into very small limits indeed. Not the least remarkable thing about Lord DUFFERIN's speech is that it was delivered at all. That a man of the world, one not accustomed to talk superfluously, or to kick at open doors, should have convinced himself that it was necessary to insist on all the elementary facts Lord DUFFERIN set forth is in itself a striking comment on the political sense of the body politic of to-day. Yet Lord DUFFERIN did well to say it all.

M. FERRY.

IN the midst of the general want of character which is painfully conspicuous in French politics at present, there is something very refreshing in the toughness of M. FERRY. He has suffered a series of disasters. His Government was upset violently. During several Sessions he has been compelled to remain silent in the Chamber, because his appearance in the tribune would have produced a storm of howls and insult. Finally, he has been defeated in a constituency in which he was thought to be safe. A tenth of this would have swept most other Frenchmen into obscurity. But M. FERRY is not obscure. His countrymen may hate him, but they cannot neglect him. And his survival is due neither to claptrap, nor to scandal, nor to popularity-hunting. He forces Frenchmen to recognize his individual force and faculty. When one road is shut to him he takes another. This tenacity of his is at least infinitely respectable as compared to the limpness of his contemporaries. We do not profess to respect his vitality the less because its last manifestation has taken the form of an indirect answer to a recent platitude of Mr. GLADSTONE's. The article in the Estafette, which he may safely be taken to have inspired, if he did not write it, is the answer of one who knows his countrymen well to the absurd assertion that Frenchmen are anxious for the friendship of England. M. FERRY had perhaps not the advantage of having his contempt stirred by this particular piece of nonsense, but he answered it none the less. In substance what his inspired paper says, and what the vast majority of Frenchmen believe, is that friendship with England is impossible for them. They wish for her removal from their path or her submission to their power; but her friendship, if by that word is to be understood a mutual exchange of good offices on terms of equality, they neither believe in nor desire. M. FERRY's reminder that it was Mr. GLADSTONE's own Government which did France the shrewdest turn she has suffered since the loss of Alsace and Lorraine is amusingly timely.

The article in the Estafette is, however, only a part, and a small one, of a campaign which M. FERRY has been fighting for some little time, just to remind his enemies that he is not yet extinguished. On the whole, he has been remarkably successful. Formally he has been engaged in putting some Italians right as to the history of the transactions which led up to the occupation of Tunis. On a survey of the controversy an impartial judge will, we think, come to the conclusion that both parties are much in the right. Prince BISMARCK did not say at the Berlin Conference "Prenez Carthage," or any other foolish and compromising equivalent thing. It is not his way. In so far the French are right. But he never said he would oppose the occupation. Why should he? And so the Italians are right, in a way, in saying he encouraged the French. Then the French Ministers probably did say that they had no immediate intention of occupying the Regency. In so far the Italians lie not. But they never said France would never occupy it; and so M. FERRY is right in saying that no guarantee was given. Very likely the Italians began to bestir themselves in Tunis, as M. FERRY says they did. Then M. FERRY invented the Kroumirs (he confesses as much, tongue in cheek), and thereupon the French walked in, to the fury of the Italians, who do not deny they were very angry. It is a plausible fable; and, if the name of Tunis was changed to Burmah, might be told of other people—only M. FERRY says nothing about that, for obvious reasons. The controversy may be of use to the future historian. For the moment, the most instructive thing about it is the information it affords as to what M. FERRY thinks his interests require him to tell. If he is right, France is not at this moment longing for friendship with Germany, with Italy, or with England. That he stood aloof from the wicked Prince, that he played Italy successfully, that he will have us out of Egypt—these are the points on which M. FERRY insists. There is nothing friendly in any of them, and the last passage in the debate, with its gird at the "legendary atrocities" in Bulgaria, is particularly cool, to say no more, to the distinguished statesman who has undertaken to interpret the brotherly emotions of France. Happily, M. FERRY is not especially popular in France at present; and France is becoming less and less inclined, as far as we can see, to run the risk of putting its desires to the test of practice. Only, if M. FERRY's unpopularity melted away, and the will of France hardened a little, we should soon see what the love of Frenchmen for peace and for England amounted to. We trust that M. FERRY will continue to prove that there is one Frenchman whom unpopularity and want of office cannot crush.

MR. GOSCHEN AT BLACKPOOL.

THE weighty address delivered by the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER at Blackpool on Thursday night brought the series of his speeches this week to a most effective close. It went over the ground traversed by Mr. GLADSTONE at Southport, and yet left room for a particularly telling side-hit at Mr. MORLEY's absurd pretension on behalf of himself and his colleagues to the position of the WASHINGTONS and FRANKLINS of Home Rule, the privacy of whose majestic deliberations is to be held sacred until such time as they are prepared to acquaint us with the principles and details of their new scheme for the dismemberment of the United Kingdom. The little difference, as Mr. GOSCHEN pointed out, between these gentlemen and the American statesmen whom they fancy themselves to resemble is that they have begun, as their prototypes did not, by producing one Constitution which was rejected by the country with contumely. It is ridiculous for the "Fathers" of so misbegotten a progeny to suppose that their next essay in political procreation is to be awaited in reverential patience by a whole community. The statement that their first Constitution was "rejected with contumely" we should have thought to be absolutely unassailable; but a Gladstonian commentator has replied with the naïf question, "Well, now, was it?" To which we can only answer in the words "Well, now, wasn't it?" For, if it was not, its treatment by its own parents is unnatural to the point of criminality. The case is either one of untimely decease or of premature interment; since, if the country has not killed Mr. GLADSTONE's Bill, he himself has ostentatiously buried it, and without a word of regret.

Mr. GOSCHEN's treatment of the three points on which Mr. GLADSTONE based his assertion that the Ministerial policy had failed in Ireland was remarkably complete—much more so, indeed, in our opinion, than much of the subject-matter deserved. When a man who has been three times Prime Minister of England condescends to argue that a particular method of governing Ireland should be abandoned because certain persons in England have "cheered" a conspiracy which the highest courts of law in Ireland have declared to be illegal, it would be more respectful to his former reputation to ignore the argument altogether. The Court of Common Council, who were reported to Mr. GLADSTONE (by Professor STUART?) to have cheered the Plan of Campaign, have a right, however, to repudiate the charge, as they have done; and it is, no doubt, quite natural for Mr. GLADSTONE to think that the applause was just as "remarkable and serious" a portent whether it was uttered in the Council Chamber itself or "within the building"—that is to say, by the casual and irresponsible loafers in the Great Hall. A statesman who regards an unloaded gun as a no "less remarkable and serious" thing to present at the head of a "boy in every sense of the word" than a loaded one, is evidently in the habit of estimating the qualities of noteworthiness and gravity by tests only known to himself. With Mr. GLADSTONE's less frivolous contentions—namely, that the Ministerial policy in Ireland has failed (1) because agrarian outrages in that country are not now less in number than they were, as Mr. GOSCHEN puts it, in one year carefully selected by Mr. GLADSTONE himself; and (2) because the Government have not supplied statistics with respect to the number of evicted farms which had been taken by fresh occupants—the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER dealt at greater length. He had little difficulty, of course, in showing, not only that the comparison of crime-lists for these two arbitrarily associated years was in itself fallacious, but that it leaves out of account altogether the matter of boycotting and of the immense and most valuable improvement which has taken place with respect to that matter during the last two years. As regards the question of evicted farms, on which Mr. MORLEY, it may be remembered, once descanted with such indiscreet satisfaction, it is simply not the fact, as Mr. GLADSTONE insinuates (for he owns to having no grounds upon which to assert it), that such farms are lying derelict in the same number as was the case a few years ago. On the contrary, they are being taken up and cultivated with much greater freedom and confidence than formerly; and if there is still room for greater activity in this respect, it is solely due to the still surviving, though fast disappearing, dread of that "strong, but peaceful, opinion," as Mr. GLADSTONE calls it, which once expressed itself in the boycotting and maiming of the tenants who ventured to take an evicted farm.

THE ART CONGRESS.

IT is a part of the unending game which the eternal MAYA, as M. RENAN might say, plays with the children of men that, in spite of experience and apostolic authority, they will persist in believing that, by taking heed, they can add to their stature. Accordingly, they collect in Congresses from time to time, with intent to see whether by talking about it, declaring that the thing ought to be done, and suggesting the use of various kinds of cooking apparatus, they cannot produce literature, or science, or art, or what not. It is, therefore, quite according to precedent that a National Association for the Advancement of Art and its Application to Industry should be formed, and that it should hold Congresses at Edinburgh and elsewhere. It is a quite innocent thing to do, and can produce no considerable harm. After all, no man ever grew the shorter for wishing to be tall. Besides, when people collect together to talk about art, some of them will probably be interesting, and a few of them are sure to be absurd. In either case they are more or less worth listening to. Let us listen to the Edinburgh Congress. We have a good quarrel to do so either way.

Really a right-minded man will have much sympathy with the Congress. It is highly desirable that art should be advanced and applied to industry. We all wish these things could be done, and also that some Congress would be good enough to tell us how to get over the enormous initial difficulty of doing them—that it would tell us, namely, how to obtain the art to advance and apply. The eternal MAYA instils a belief in the human mind that art is a sort of a something from which any man can cut slices, if only he makes his mind up to do it and takes a knife. But the truth is—as, indeed, Mr. WILLIAM HOLE explained most excellently to the Congress—that art is something which dwells in a man's self, and causes him to produce artistic things. It has yet to be shown that Congresses—or schools either, for that matter—can confer this well of life upon any man. For this reason we listen with very languid hope, though with placid approval, while the Marquess of LORNE explains what good consequences may flow from the extension of art-schools. Unhappily, no great art was ever taught in schools, though the habit of slavish imitation has often been formed in them. Even that is better than mere bungling. If you cannot produce art yourself, the next best thing is to imitate what other men have done. Machinery, whether water, or steam, or scholastic, can only put existing things together. It cannot create. But the belief in machinery is strong in the Congress—even in Mr. WATTS, who denounces it fiercely. He thinks, as others have thought, that it kills art. For our part, we incline to the opinion that, where the artistic faculty exists, it is infinitely more likely to use the machinery. It is not so weak as to die by levers or water-wheels, or triple expansion engines either—nor yet will it come at the beck and call of schools and Congresses. For the rest, it is idle to complain that the nineteenth century is not the sixteenth, and that England is not Greece. This is his Sparta in time and place, and the artist must adorn it. If he cannot, he need not complain of want of encouragement or training. Let him acknowledge his own want of power and cease from troubling. He is to do his work where he is, as other men have done, and not ask to have the world turned upside down for him. Besides, if the world were turned upside down, is it so sure that our artist would make so much of it? In the universe as it is Mr. WATTS has contrived to paint very beautiful pictures. If other artists in other lines had Mr. WATTS's faculty, they would make beautiful pots, carriages, and wall-papers—steam machinery to the contrary notwithstanding. It is, of course, one of the charms of this, as of other Congresses, that fads have their share of it. Mr. HORSLEY has not been wanting to himself, and has broken a lance manfully for his doxy. Sufficient justice is hardly done to Mr. HORSLEY. He is perfectly right in not painting the nude, since he holds those opinions of his. And there is another thing which may be said. It is that, if painters give up working in that spirit and for that taste which Mr. HORSLEY denounces, there would be a sudden and vast diminution in the number of pictures of naked women (studies from the nude is the proper cant phrase) which cover so much space on exhibition walls. Whether the interests of art would thereby suffer is a question which we commend to the attention of the Congress. It would do well to devote a day to fasting and humiliation, and clear its mind of cant before it started on the discussion. When it had once entered on that straight and narrow path which no cant adorns, there is no reason why it should stop at the use of the undressed in art.

THE TWELVE-POUNDER BREECH-LOADING GUN.

IT is a curious circumstance that England, which was the first Power to adopt a breech-loading field-gun, should have been until a few years ago the only nation who still armed its artillery with the muzzle-loaders, which the majority of our regimental officers, and a consensus of scientific opinion on the Continent, had no hesitation in condemning. Into the hotly-debated question of muzzle- and breech-loading guns we have now no intention of straying. That classic battleground has at length happily been deserted, and the controversy set at rest. Confidence in oneself is doubtless an excellent quality in both nations and individuals; but an obstinacy which maintained that all the rest of the world were fools, and we only wise, that Krupp with the experiences of 1870 before him was a dullard, and the success of the German artillery a delusion, is not a trait to be proud of, and the less said about it now the better. With insular prejudice we tried an English breech-loading system, found it defective, decided that therefore no breech-loading guns could be of any value, and took up an immovable position on the supposed simplicity and durability of the old muzzle-loaders. Fortunately the march of science was not so easily to be checked, great strides in gun manufacture have been brought about, and now again we find in our Arsenal breech-loaders of all imaginable sizes, from a quick-firing gun to the monster of 100 tons or more. The general public who read of foreign field-guns in the diaries of newspaper correspondents were always sceptical as to the system of gunmaking till recently in favour, and there has lately been manifested a keen anxiety both in the House and elsewhere that all our field batteries should be in possession of the new arm. Indeed, people seem now disposed to attach an almost exaggerated importance to the introduction of the 12-pounder, which we shall have presently to show is yet some way from being the beau-ideal of a field-piece. The latest development of the muzzle-loader—namely, the 13-pounder, had a considerable fire-effect, but there were dangers and inconveniences connected with its construction which were sufficient to militate against its general introduction. Its weight as a Horse Artillery gun was excessive, its great length rendered it more or less unwieldy, while its enlarged powder-chamber made it impossible for the sponge to search out the recesses of the bore and introduced a considerable element of danger to its detachment when a rapid fire was necessary. In power, accuracy, and rapidity of fire it was not greatly inferior to the newer type, while its projectile was practically much the same. The breech-loader, however, can be made to fire a larger charge without increasing the length of the powder-chamber, and better effect can thus be obtained. As regards strength and durability the advantage is with the muzzle-loader, but not so to a very marked degree. The argument most effectively used for muzzle-loaders was that they necessarily consisted of fewer parts than breech-loaders, and that, therefore, not only had no complicated stores and spare parts to be taken into the field, but less care in the handling of the guns was necessary. It was maintained that for an artillery like our own, when guns, ammunition, and stores must be interchangeable, and be used in such various climates as those of our colonies and Indian Empire, simplicity is of greater importance than in the case of nations who rarely send their troops beyond the Continent. The most modern forms of closing the breech are, however, so simple, solidly constructed and serviceable as to almost entirely obviate this objection. The unquestionable advantage of the breech-loader lies in the fact that, by using it, increased safety can be obtained for the gun detachment. In loading a muzzle-loader, even of the obsolete types, some of the numbers had to expose themselves a good deal. With long, modern guns this danger was increased, and the protection of cover was of little avail to those loading the piece. Behind gun-pits or earth-works the detachment of a breech-loader may be all almost wholly under cover, while even in the open it is protected to a certain extent by the carriage in front of it. There are those who maintain that, in view of the increasing efficacy of small-arm fire, some protection in the shape of shields must be provided for the gunners at close ranges. Without discussing a point concerning which there is considerable variance of opinion, we may observe that such an innovation would be much more feasible, and could be made better use of, in the case of a breech-loading than a muzzle-loading gun. There are also some other practical advantages on service with breech-loaders which we may briefly notice.

They can be easily unloaded, and the time-fuze can be readjusted. It is easier to come into action with them already charged, and during a very rapid fire there is less chance of an accident than with the modern muzzle-loader of enlarged chamber and central vent. To proceed to a more detailed account of the new 12-pounder, which as regards power, velocity, and range is inferior to no light field-gun on the Continent, we may mention that its weight is 7 cwt., its length 7 feet 8 inches, its calibre 3 inches, and that it is entirely composed of tough steel. It is rifled by means of twelve shallow grooves, which have an increasing twist for half the bore, from 1 turn in 120 calibres to 1 turn in 28, and then a uniform twist of 1 in 28 calibres for the outer half of the bore. It is chambered at the breech to a diameter of 3.625 inches, so as to utilize as large a charge of powder as possible. The breech is closed by a solid breech-block swung on a hinge at the end of the bore. When the gun is being loaded, this is swung clear; when it is ready to be fired, the block is pushed in, and kept in its place by revolving it a quarter of a turn, which causes an interrupted male screw on the breech-block to bite into a female screw in the bore. Its charge is 4 lbs. of a large-grained, slow-burning powder, which gives the high velocity of 1,700 feet a second to the shell, and at the same times generates lower pressures in the bore than is the case with the old powder known as R.L.G.

While the gun is comparatively light, therefore, we find its muzzle velocity very high; and this brings us to the great difficulty with which the construction of high velocity field-guns is invested. The gun and carriage must not exceed a certain weight, in order that sufficient mobility should be preserved. Yet large powder charges and light guns and carriages bring about an altogether excessive recoil. This has to be counteracted by a system of brakes or hydraulic buffers. But in thus checking the evil we throw an enormous strain on the gun-carriage, and, moreover, cause a marked tendency on its part to "jump." This not only unduly tries its strength, but materially affects the accuracy of the gun. The attempt to produce the extra 100 feet of initial velocity is what does the mischief. It is comparatively easy to construct a suitable field-carriage for a 1,600 feet velocity gun; but the last straw breaks the camel's back, and a 1,700 feet gun demands a carriage constructed at great expense, and even then severely tries it. The wheels are destroyed by the enormous torsion due to the resistance being communicated from the tire through the spokes, and all parts of the carriage suffer likewise. Another disadvantage of high velocity is the uneven "jump." With a lower velocity and a carriage of the same weight the "jump" would be much more uniform, inasmuch as it would necessarily be less, and the differences would decrease in the same proportion. The question is altogether a most complex one, and is a thorn in the side of the modern artillerist. It is impossible to strengthen the carriage without adding to its weight; and even now the weight behind the team with our 12-pounder is greater than with any other Horse Artillery gun in Europe. It would likewise be impossible to reduce the number of rounds carried—already none too many—or to lighten the equipment in any way. It is to be noticed, however, that in both the French and German armies the whole detachment of the Horse Artillery are mounted, while with us two numbers find seats on the limber. The reduction of weight caused by the removal of two lusty "limber gunners" would allow more weight to be put into the carriage, and still keep the total burthen below our present standard. If the present high-velocity is to be maintained, this appears a reasonable solution of a knotty point. There are, however, murmurs that this same high velocity is, perhaps, hardly worth the candle, and that shrapnell is even more effective when fired with more moderate charges. The difficulties of providing a good time-fuze for the 12-pounder have been very great, and results have, as regards shrapnell, hardly realized expectations. It is not unlikely, therefore, that some modification of existing arrangements may take place, and that, without losing in effect, we may be able to reduce the cause of many of the difficulties which surround the question. Meanwhile it is gratifying to hear that the 12-pounder "shoots like a rifle," that its mechanism has proved thoroughly serviceable after several years' use, and that it is more than a match for any field-gun we might have to face.

FOUNDERS' SHARES.

AS has already been stated in these columns, the new system of Founders' shares has hit the fancy of the investing and speculating public. In illustration of this we may state that the 10% Founders' shares in one particular Company are quoted just now at 7,000%, and in another Company at 15,000%; while the 1% Founders' shares are quoted from 140% in one case, up to 700% in another. At the same time the system is criticized very severely by many people, some even going so far as to say that it is hardly honest. That is of course absurd. The obligation resting upon promoters of joint-stock Companies is plain enough. They are bound to take reasonable care, in the first place, to satisfy themselves of the value of the property which they offer to sell to the public; and they are bound, in the second place, to lay all material facts before the public, neither suggesting anything false nor suppressing anything true, so that an intending subscriber may have full materials before him to judge what the securities are worth. If the promoters do this, they clearly are not guilty of dishonesty. On the other hand, the advocates of the system contend that it affords a guarantee to investors superior to any other. If, for example, promoters sell a property or business for cash, they may have perfectly honourable reasons for doing so; but they are open to the suspicion that they do not themselves believe the property or business to be worth the price they ask for it. At all events, having obtained the money, it does not matter to them whether the Company afterwards succeeds or fails. Again, even where promoters take payment partly in cash and partly in shares, they probably secure in money all that they had already laid out, and they consequently stand to lose only expected profits. But in the Founders' shares system the promoters usually receive no payment in cash. The ordinary plan is to issue only a small number of Founders' shares—say, a thousand 1*l*. shares for every 100,000*l*. of share capital. The holders of the Ordinary shares are entitled to a preferential dividend of 5, 7, or 10 per cent., as the case may be. And only when this preferential dividend is paid are the holders of the Founders' shares entitled to anything. The more usual plan is that they are to get half the surplus profits. Therefore, it is contended the promoters give the strongest proof of their own belief in the goodness of the business they ask the public to subscribe to. There is a certain amount of force in this contention; but it must not be pushed too far, as will be seen when we refer to existing shares at a premium. Meantime, we would point out that very often no property or actual business is sold. A Company is formed and offered for subscription to the public not to purchase land, or mines, or concessions, or patents, but itself to create and carry on a business. What is really sold, then, is an idea, suggestion, or project. It may turn out profitable; but if it does, it has to be made so by the capital subscribed by the Ordinary shareholders and by the skill of the managers appointed. In such a case as this—and it is the more frequent case—where Founders' shares are created, it would seem only reasonable that some limit should be fixed to what the holders of Founders' shares are entitled to take. Either they should receive half the surplus profits only for a definite number of years, or there should be a maximum beyond which they should not be entitled to participate in any one year. Of course, even in such a case there is no ground for charging the founders with dishonesty. The public know what they are agreeing to, and, if they do not think the price too high, it would hardly be reasonable to expect that the vendors should be more particular. But in the interest of the public we would point out that, where no actually existing property is sold, they should insist upon fixing some limit beyond which the holders of Founders' shares should not be entitled to participate in future profits.

The system of Founders' shares, then, is liable to abuse, like every other, but it is not necessarily dishonest. Even, however, where a Company formed upon this plan is conceived in good faith, the system is dangerous. Every Company properly managed ought to make some provision for deterioration. Machinery wears out, mines are apt to become exhausted, and trade itself is now and then diverted from one channel to another. Therefore, there ought to be formed in every Company a sinking fund of some kind or other. Further, it is to be borne in mind that great prosperity cannot be expected to last for ever. There are perpetual ups and downs in trade. Besides, if a Company declares very high dividends, it is likely to attract such competition as will quickly reduce its profits. A well-managed Company, then, will build up a reserve fund to provide against contingencies. But how can there be a sinking fund or a reserve fund formed where Founders' shares exist? As the holders of Founders' shares postpone their claim to participation in profits until the Ordinary shareholders have received the percentage agreed upon, the spirit of the contract requires that the surplus should be fully distributed. The promoters evidently intend that this shall be done. They appoint the first directors, and in doing so it may be expected that they will select men on whom they can count to carry out their intention. The probability, therefore, is, that where Founders' shares exist the profits will be divided up to the last penny. It is, therefore, eminently desirable in the interests of the Ordinary shareholders that in Companies with Founders' shares a provision should be inserted in the articles of association for the gradual accumulation both of a sinking fund and of a reserve fund. But perhaps the strongest objection of all to this Founders' shares system is that it almost inevitably fosters speculation and improper manipulation of the stock markets. Usually, when a Company of this kind is brought out, only half the shares are at first issued. The Ordinary share capital, for example, is fixed at 200,000*l*., let us say, in shares of 1*l*. each, and 100,000*l*. is first issued, the intention being to issue the remaining half of the capital by-and-bye. The holders of the Founders' shares, who are the promoters and their friends, have a very strong interest indeed to rig the market, and raise the Ordinary shares to a premium. If they do this, and keep the shares at a premium for a considerable time, they will probably be able to issue the second half of the capital at a premium. If they are, the premium is a clear profit, and it is divisible between the Ordinary shareholders and the holders of the Founders' shares, if it is large enough to leave a surplus after the agreed percentage is paid to the Ordinary shareholders. Except where there is an actual or virtual monopoly, the business must be extraordinary indeed which can yield dividends of, let us say, 10 per cent. for any length of time. It is not to be presumed, therefore, that the promoters expect to receive much dividend on their Founders' shares from the business for which ostensibly the Company is created. Their real calculation is that the future issue of shares will be made at a premium, and that out of this premium they will receive very large returns. The system, then, in its very nature fosters improper manipulation of the stock markets, and undue speculation. And it is this which constitutes the strongest objection to the system—not the supposed dishonest arrangement, or the undue claim to participation in profits. The objection might be removed either by an express renunciation on the part of the holders of Founders' shares of any claim to participation in profits arising out of the issue of shares at a premium, or by the prohibition, at the outset, of the practice of issuing shares at a premium. Until something of the kind is done cautious investors will do well to look with distrust upon all Companies with Founders' shares. The presumption is that the market will be rigged for the purpose of extracting profits from unwary investors.

There is another way still in which speculation is stimulated by Founders' shares. At the present time issuing houses scarcely ever venture to bring out new loans or Companies until they have had them either wholly or largely underwritten—that is to say, until middlemen undertake, in case the public should not subscribe, themselves to take and pay for either the whole or a considerable part of the new issue. As these middlemen do not enter into this arrangement in the character of investors—on the contrary, as they desire that they should be called upon to pay for little or none of the new bonds or shares—they must, of course, be induced to underwrite by the offer of some advantage which the general public do not get. Formerly they were generally given the shares or bonds at a discount of, say, 5 or 10 per cent.; but now Founders' shares are found to be more attractive. Suppose, for example, that a person agrees to underwrite a thousand 1*l*. shares, and is given as a compensation one or two Founders' shares. If the underwriter is lucky, and the public subscribe for the whole of the shares, he has his one or two Founders' shares for practically nothing, and he may be able to sell them for 200*l*. or 300*l*. apiece immediately. Even in the worst case, where the public do not subscribe, and he is called upon to pay for the thousand shares underwritten by him, he still has his one or two Founders' shares to reduce the sum by which he is out of pocket. The Founders' shares, at all events, are sure to be at a premium, and may be saleable immediately, perhaps, at 200*l*. each. If they are kept longer, they may be sold at a still higher price. This plan undoubtedly facilitates the issues of new Companies that are coming out in such numbers at present. And by so doing it encourages reckless, and even fraudulent, promotion. We do not mean, of course, that in every case where there are Founders' shares the promotion of the Company is either reckless or fraudulent. But reckless and fraudulent promoters are encouraged to prey upon the public by the fact that Founders' shares are in such request at present, that by offering them to premium-hunters with ready money at command they are able to induce them to underwrite with very little previous inquiry.

RACING.

WE thought it would come! Ten-thousand-pound stakes are no longer to be confined to weight-for-age races, for a handicap of that value is to be run for at Leicester in 1891 by three-year-olds. The example made by Donovan and Ayrshire of the monster weight-for-age races this season induces the management of Leicester races to believe that a handicap of high value will be a welcome variety to many owners. The Secretary, in recommending the race, points out that, if the stipulated number of subscriptions is made, the owner of every horse left in after the 1st of January in the year the race is to be run will practically have 200 to 1 laid against his horse, which in these days of post-betting will be a decided advantage; and, better still, that "upon the broad principle of handicapping every horse should have an equal chance, in contradistinction to the weight-for-age system of racing." And this after all the preaching against handicapping that has been expended upon this unwilling generation! A handicap of 10,000*l*. will, indeed, be worth "readying" a horse for, and the aforesaid 200 to 1 will afford such satisfactory hedging that we think it likely the Leicestershire Royal Handicap may "commend itself to the notice" of many owners of racehorses. Whether it will be of any material assistance to the reformers who are at present endeavouring to cleanse the Augean stable of the Turf is quite another question.

Since the famous Bend Or case, no objection against the winner of a race has excited so much attention as that which was lodged six days after the Cesarewitch against Primrose Day. There were rumours of some such possibility during the settling at the betting clubs on the Monday after the Second October Meeting, and one or two firms of bookmakers refused to pay over the race until all doubts on the subject should be dispelled. The bulk of the Cesarewitch bets, however, were settled without much hesitation, and the announcement of an objection, on the Wednesday, came like a thunderclap. Then came five days of agony; but on the Monday of the Houghton week, just before the racing began, it was announced that the Stewards of the Jockey Club had overruled the objection, and the immediate effect was to make Primrose Day a stronger favourite for the Cambridgeshire.

If proof were needed that there are valuable stakes to be picked up in these days by second-rate horses, we might point to the Great Sapling Plate at Sandown. This race was worth 1,000*l.*, and the winner, Gallivanter, had just been handicapped for another race 30 lbs. below the best of his year. This colt, who cost 300 guineas as a yearling, is by Galliard out of a Speculum mare, and therefore strongly inbred to Blacklock, both his sire and his dam having been direct descendants of Voltaire, while his grandsire was himself inbred to that horse. The Orleans Nursery Handicap of 500*l.*, which was run for an hour later, had a field of fourteen, and, according to the published estimate of the official handicapper at Newmarket, the class represented was almost as good as that of the Great Sapling Plate. Sir J. Duke's Swallowfield was a strong favourite, on the strength of his good second to Lightfoot for the Kempton Park Champion Nursery Handicap of 1,000*l.* The race, however, fell to Mr. C. J. Blake's Killowen, who started at 10 to 1 and won by half a length from Bert, from whom he was receiving 5 lbs.; while Swallowfield, who was receiving 7 lbs. from Bert, was beaten by a neck for second place. A field of only half a dozen ran for the Hersham Two-Year-Old Stakes of 500*l.* on the Friday. Of these, Mr. Maple's Barquette was entered to be sold for 1,000*l.*, and consequently had to give from 9 lbs. to 12 lbs. to each of her opponents. Nevertheless, odds were laid upon this filly, who was believed to be about 2 st. below first class, and she won "with ridiculous ease by a length and a half." The Temple Handicap of 500*l.* produced a very pretty race. There was a field of eighteen, and Mr. Maple's The Gloamin' was made the favourite. The horses kept in a compact body for a long way. When they had run about half the course, Lord Dudley's Maskery, an outsider at 14 to 1, took a slight lead, attended by Mr. H. Milner's Athol Lass, the second favourite. Maskery, admirably ridden by G. Barrett, won by half a length, while Admiral Benbow, who came with a rush at the end, finished three-quarters of a length in front of Athol Lass.

The stakes on the first day of the Newmarket Houghton Meeting were not so valuable as those of the previous Thursday and Friday at Sandown. Now that the Cambridgeshire is postponed until the Thursday, it would be well to introduce some new race of value in the early part of the week. Without doubt the Newmarket authorities can be tolerably certain of obtaining large entries for trifling stakes at a place where so many horses are trained, as was proved on the Monday by the long list of nominations for the 100*l.* and 200*l.* Plates, for one of which there were no less than forty-three horses entered; but, if racing between horses of a good class be any object, prizes worth running for ought to be offered. For the Houghton Handicap on the first day, Colonel Forester's Ice was put in at the absurd weight, for a five-year-old, of 5 st. 13 lbs.; yet it was believed that Whistle Jacket, who had shown himself about 17 or 18 lbs. inferior to Noble Chieftain and Mephisto, would be able to give her 35 lbs. The heavy state of the course upset all calculations of the prophets; the first favourite, Whistle Jacket, was beaten before he had run half-way, and Boule d'Or, a three-year-old by Bend Or, carrying 6 st. 1 lb., and an outsider at 16 to 1, made all the running and won by a head from Harlow, while Ice was third. The winner was ridden by a promising young German jockey named Pache. Ram Lal, a good-looking chestnut, or chestnut-roan, with a white face and white legs, by Bend Or's great rival, Robert the Devil, won the Rous Nursery. It was a beautiful race, as he barely won by a head from L'Abbé Morin, who was only a neck in front of Roraima. Here, again, backers were in error, as they had made Tostig the favourite and allowed the winner to start at 10 to 1. Neither quantity nor quality, at least so far as public form was concerned, were well represented for the Criterion Stakes on the Tuesday; yet there are few better-looking two-year-olds than the winner, the Duke of Westminster's Blue Green, a powerful, rich dark-bay colt by Beadsman out of an own sister to St. Simon. On a previous occasion he had shown temper; now he ran kindly enough, and the improvement which he has recently made may be understood when it is remembered that at Ascot he was unplaced to Keythorpe; for now, with only 4 lbs. more between them, Keythorpe was unplaced to Blue Green. Nearly everybody thought that Strawberry Hill had won the Criterion Nursery; but it turned out that the race had in reality been won by Mr. L. de Rothschild's Polonius, on whom T. Loates stole up on the opposite side of the course, and won by a head. People were so occupied in discussing this unexpected result as to forget that only twenty minutes, instead of thirty, were allowed between the last two races, and Fear Disgrace and Hayraddin had fought out a close finish before there was time to bet on either of them—a most unusual occurrence on a racecourse.

The victory of Baron Rothschild's Le Nord for the Dewhurst Plate was something more than a confirmation of the superiority which he showed to Alloway for the Champagne Stakes at Doncaster; for in that race, when very hard pressed to run Riviera to a head, he had only finished three-quarters of a length in front of Alloway at even weights, whereas now he gave Alloway 4 lbs. and beat him very easily indeed by a length. This showed that he had improved since Doncaster, and consequently Signorina's hollow victory over him by three lengths for the Middle Park Plate appeared a greater performance than ever. This reminds us that the best two-year-old in France this season is also a filly—M. Ephrussi's Alicante, a chestnut filly by Hermit out of Madeira—and, if she meets Signorina for the Grand Prix de Paris next year, there ought to be an interesting race.

There was a decidedly better class of horses this year in the field for the Cambridgeshire than in that for the Cesarewitch, and it was a far more satisfactory race in many ways. As soon as the weights appeared, early in September, the prophets almost unanimously recommended Colonel North's bay filly, Philomel, who had distinguished herself last year in Ireland as the probable winner. As she had been unplaced in the two only races in which she had run this year, and was handicapped to give 2 st. 1 lb. to a filly of her own age—who, by the way, subsequently won the Cesarewitch—it seemed a bold thing to make her first favourite. On public form alone, we think no one would have entertained the idea of backing her, with 8 st. 1 lb. to carry; and, although she stood at one time at 12 to 1, she started at 50. The first race, after the publication of the weights, to affect the Cambridgeshire betting to any very marked extent was the Eleventh Great Foal Stakes at the First October Meeting. For this stake Mr. J. V. Laurance's bay filly, Wishing Gate, beat Pioneer, the first favourite and the winner of the St. James's Palace Stakes of 1,800*l.* at Ascot, by three lengths. She is a deep-bodied, powerful, and well-shaped filly on short legs, and it was at one time thought that, with 7 st. 6 lbs.—or 9 lbs. less than Philomel—to carry, she had a brilliant prospect of winning the Cambridgeshire, so she was made first favourite. On the 3rd of October, however, it was rumoured that she had been beaten in a trial, and she went down at once to 25 to 1 in the betting, to return by degrees to 14 at the start. At the same weight as Wishing Gate stood Captain Llewellyn Jones's Theophilus, a good-looking, if not exactly very stylish, colt, by Arbitrator out of Theodora. In a race at Liverpool this year he had beaten Morglay, who in his turn had beaten Miguel, the second in both the Derby and the St. Leger; yet Theophilus was handicapped for the Cambridgeshire at the same weight as Davenport, who, subsequently to the publication of the weights, finished three lengths behind Miguel for the St. Leger, and appeared, on this form, to be decidedly inferior to Theophilus, so the latter started at 9 to 1, while 33 to 1 was laid against Davenport. Goldseeker's City and Suburban form had been excellent; yet in three other races, although he had been much overweighted, he had not run up to the expectations of his backers, more especially when, with 3 to 1 laid on him, he was beaten by Redsand when giving 11 lbs. more than weight for age. If a little long from the saddle to the hip, he has excellent shoulders, strong loins, powerful quarters, and short legs; and it was necessary that he should be both swift and powerful if he was now to win under 8 st. 12 lbs. in heavy ground. Zanzibar's claims rested upon her form of last year, when she won the Sussex and the Nassau Stakes at Goodwood; for this season she had only run once, and was then unplaced; but at 7 st. 7 lbs. she was fairly treated for a four-year-old. She is, however, very small—probably little more than fifteen hands in height, nor is she particularly strong for her size. She was a leading favourite once, at 12 to 1; but a temporary lameness interfered with her work, and she started at 100 to 1. Like Zanzibar, Belle Mahone had not run up to her three-year-old form this year, having been unplaced in each of her three races, and she was put into the Cambridgeshire at the same weight as Zanzibar, who had been unplaced to her at even weights a year ago at Doncaster. She, again, is on a small scale; but she is beautifully moulded, and has great depth of girth for her size. Another four-year-old at the same weight was Caerlaverock, a fine, handsome colt, if just a trifle "leggy," who had won the Corinthian Plate at Goodwood; and considering the form shown at the First October Meeting by St. Helen, he did not do badly in giving her 10 lbs. and running her to a head at Doncaster; but we shall refer to him again presently. Some backers like the mystery of a "dark" horse, and for these the great, raking, powerful, if rather plain, three-year-old filly Claribelle, who had not run before in public this season, but had shown winning form last year, was just to their taste, with the nice weight of 6 st. 7 lbs., and 20 to 1 laid against her.

The exceedingly easy victory of Primrose Day in the Cesarewitch considerably altered the aspect of the Cambridgeshire. So hollow was her victory that it was believed she would be but little hindered for the Cambridgeshire by the stone extra which she had earned by winning the Cesarewitch; for she had appeared to win that race with quite a couple of stone in hand. She started favourite at 5½ to 1, and her stable companion, Judith, a three-year-old that had won a handicap at Epsom during the Derby week, and was now carrying only 5 st. 12 lbs., was a good deal backed at 25 to 1. Another race at the Second October Meeting which affected the position in the betting-market of a Cambridgeshire candidate was the Great Challenge Stakes. The favourite, Heaume, won easily, as was expected; but Caerlaverock, who started at 10 to 1, gave the very brilliant, but equally uncertain, Noble Chieftain, who started at 11 to 8, a most decisive beating at even weights for second place, and he started fourth favourite for the Cambridgeshire. Laureate's third to Donovan for the Newmarket Stakes had been better than Davenport's for the St. Leger, and for the Hastings Plate he had given Freemason 10 lbs. and run him to a neck. If a little awkward in his slow paces, he had grand action in his gallop; but it was thought that his feet were too small to do him justice in such heavy ground. We may observe here that, in order to counteract this defect as far as possible, his trainer ran him with no plates on his feet. He seemed fairly treated enough at 7 st. 9 lbs. As a two-year-old he had run Theophilus to a head when giving him a stone, and now he was to give him only 3 lbs., so that, unless their relative form had greatly changed, he was bound to beat him. Nevertheless, Theophilus was the better favourite. Shillelagh, the winner of the Royal Hunt Cup at Ascot last year, had only been out once this season, and he had 8 st. 1 lb. to carry. A great compliment was paid to Prince Soltykoff's Mephisto when he was handicapped at 8 st. 12 lbs; but he was said to have done great things in a trial with Sheen and Gold. For the last three years Martley had been a ruinous horse to backers; this, however, was said to be his opportunity under the light impost, for a five-year-old, of 6 st. 12 lbs., and at the start he became a strong second favourite at 7 to 1. Others thought that the great, giraffe-necked, weight-carrying Rejected, with his large, flat feet, would do well over the heavy course; but 8 st. 7 lbs. was a heavy weight even for so big and powerful a horse to carry. The once famous Rêve d'Or's day was generally supposed to be over; nevertheless, she was looking well and fairly muscular, and, for a five-year-old of such celebrity, she was favourably handicapped at 7 st. 10 lbs. Mr. W. J. Legh's Ronda, a plain filly with bent hocks, was backed at 20 to 1, as she was the chosen representative of the stable which contained Veracity and Danbydale, who had been for a short time first favourite, but was scratched long before the race.

At this time of year, mists, dark clouds, or rain too often make it difficult to see racing well; but fortunately the light was excellent when the twenty-one starters for the Cambridgeshire got off, after a couple of failures. It was a good start, and when they had settled down in their gallop, Claribelle took a clear lead and made the running, as she well might with her great size and light burden. Judith also was well in front, although her stable companion, the first favourite, appeared to be outpaced from the start. Before reaching the Bushes, Philomel and Mephisto were beaten, and a like fate befell Goldseeker on the crest of the hill, where, on the contrary, Theophilus, Laureate, and Martley rapidly improved their positions. No horse, with any apparent chance, was now left in the race with more than 7 st. 9 lbs. on its back, and the state of the ground may have been the chief cause of the early defeat of the heavily-weighted division. In descending the hill, Claribelle, who was still leading, did not move so freely as she had done on level ground, and, rolling a little in her action, she slackened her pace, and was caught by Laureate and Theophilus. The trio ran together into the Abingdon Bottom, with Martley next to them. That horse appeared to be "pulling double," but, just as he looked most dangerous, he collapsed quite suddenly, like the rank knave that he is. On ascending the hill Laureate obtained the lead, and held it to the end, winning the Cambridgeshire by two lengths from Claribelle, who was but a head in front of Theophilus, Martley being fourth, Wishing Gate fifth, and the first favourite and winner of the Cesarewitch only ninth. The result was an exact confirmation of Laureate's superiority to Theophilus as a two-year-old, and the winner's performance was a very fair one, although nothing remarkable. There was a difference of opinion as to the manner in which he was handled; for while Warne's riding was praised by some judges, others considered that he finished rather wildly. Laureate is a muscular though not very big-boned colt, of a golden chestnut colour, and he is much in-bred to Touchstone, as his sire, Petrarch, is in-bred on both sides to that horse within the third degree, while his granddam, Feronia, had two strains of Touchstone blood, one within the third and one within the fourth degree. He started at 20 to 1, and it is reported that his owner won something like 40,000*l.* in bets by his victory.

On the same afternoon the Duke of Hamilton's Loup was unexpectedly beaten for the Glasgow Stakes by Mr. Abington's Touchwood, who had been considered about 16 lbs. his inferior. If Loup's weight for the Free Handicap was correct, this would make Touchwood within two or three pounds of Semolina and Right-Away, which it is difficult to believe. This was the last race of the day; but the first, the Troy Stakes, had been an even greater surprise, for after odds of 5 to 1 had been laid upon Mr. Rose's Lottie Smith against the Duke of Beaufort's Carabinier, the pair ran a dead-heat. The stakes were divided and so were the bets; but in the latter case it meant a heavy loss to the layers of odds, for according to the laws of betting the money wagered had to be added together and then equally divided.

On the last day, which began with brilliant sunshine and ended in torrents of rain, San Marino followed Savant's example of last year by winning the Feather Plate as a two-year-old over more than two miles—a terrible course for a filly of that age. Odds were laid on General Byrne's Amphion for the Free Handicap, in spite of the weight he was allowing his opponents, which, as the event proved, was more than he could do in one instance, as the Duke of Westminster's thick-set and, according to some, noisy chestnut colt, Ormuz, beat him by two lengths at 23 lbs., after starting at 10 to 1. At the weights it was scarcely a disgrace to Amphion, especially with such heavy going. Ormuz who was once regarded as more or less of a failure, has now won about 2,326*l.* in stakes. There was a very poor race for the Jockey Club Cup, as the Duke of Beaufort's big black colt, Benburb, had not the ghost of a chance against Prince Soltykoff's Sheen. Lord Dudley's beautiful filly, Formidable, was a far better favourite than the Duke of Portland's Semolina for the Free Handicap for Two-year-olds, although she was giving her 5 lbs. Here, again, it is probable that the "holding" condition of the course accentuated the extra weight; for Semolina won, after a fine race, by three-quarters of a length, bringing up her winnings in stakes to 9,285*l.*, and her owner's, during the last two seasons, to over 100,000*l.* In the next and last race of the meeting the extra weight once more told its tale in the heavy ground by preventing the Duke of Westminster's Blue Green, the winner of the Criterion Stakes, from beating Baron Rothschild's Vermillon. There was 10 lbs. between them, and after a grand race the pair ran a dead-heat. It may be worth while to notice the sales of Chitabob for 11,000*l.*, of Enterprise, the winner of the Two Thousand of 1887, for 5,000*l.*; of Whitefriar, to go to Germany, for 4,000*l.*; of Indian Prince, who ran third to Ormuz in the race just mentioned, for 2,000*l.*, to go to Buenos Ayres; and the reported refusals of 10,000*l.* for Barcardine and 20,000*l.* for Signorina, a price which was said to have been offered and refused also for Riviera in June.

NOTES FROM THE ZOO—THE GAUR.

AN exceptionally important addition to the Zoological Society's collection has been made during the last week by the safe arrival in Regent's Park of a young Gaur (Bos gaurus) from Pahang, Malay Peninsula, presented by Sir Cecil C. Smith, K.C.M.G. This animal, which is the "bison" of Anglo-Indian sportsmen, is not only "new to the collection," but is the first of its kind that has been seen alive in Europe, and its arrival is viewed with more than ordinary interest, owing to the fact that it belongs to a race which is said to be of such an untamable disposition, that no member of it has yet lived for any length of time in captivity, however young it may have been when captured. The present animal is a young bull, presumably about two years old, and is one of a herd of gaurs taken in April last by the Sultan of Pahang, or, to be more correct, under his direction. We gather the following facts relating to the capture from an extremely interesting letter which appeared in the Singapore Free Press and in the Field, and which was apparently written by an eyewitness. It appears that the Sultan, having conceived the idea of capturing a herd of gaurs, chose for the site of his undertaking a long narrow neck of land, skirted on three sides by the river, about a mile in length and half a mile wide at its junction with the mainland, which was known to be a favourite resort of a herd of these animals, which were accustomed to come down from the high hills at the burst of the monsoon and take up their quarters there. Having established himself in the neighbourhood with about 1,500 men, he set them to work to build a strong fence to enclose the whole promontory, with the exception of the side next to the mainland, which was to be left open for the gaurs to enter; before the fence was half finished, however, the animals unexpectedly arrived, and it was only by dint of excessively hard work that the fence was completed and they were secured. The next day a small pen about twenty yards square was constructed within the enclosure, about fifty yards from the river, and into this the whole herd, consisting of twenty-four head, was, with considerable difficulty, finally driven. The scene which ensued appears to have been a most extraordinary one, and we quote the account of it verbatim:—"It was a magnificent sight to see these great beasts congregated together, and it is doubtful whether a similar spectacle has ever been witnessed before by a European, or indeed by any one. Terrified by the noise of the beaters and wild with fear, the great creatures appeared almost mad, and rushed about attacking each other with indescribable fury. Luckily a deep drain had been cut alongside the barricade, and this prevented their charging it, otherwise they would have speedily liberated themselves. As it was, they continued to charge and fight like demons, amidst the yells and cheers of the excited crowd, until at nightfall ten of the noble beasts lay dead or dying. Two more succumbed during the night, and it was a pitiable sight next morning to see the twelve survivors all jaded and gory, utterly exhausted, but still vicious and 'game.'" Ultimately these twelve survivors, by being driven in single file down a narrow alley about five feet wide between strong fences erected for the purpose, were safely caged and floated on covered bamboo rafts down the river to Pekan, the capital of Pahang, and one of them—the animal now in the Zoo—was presented to Sir C. C. Smith, the Governor of the Straits Settlements, by whom it has been sent to England.

The gaur, which extends its range from Hindostan through the Indo-Chinese countries to the Malay Peninsula, is the largest and fiercest of wild cattle, and is said to be not only untamable, but so fierce that it will hold its own against the tiger. It grows to an enormous height, bulls measuring eighteen hands at the withers being apparently not uncommon; and specimens have been recorded, on the authority of well-known sportsmen, which far exceeded even this great height. For example, one killed by Mr. Ditmas stood not less than 20 hands 3¼ ins., or 6 ft. 11¼ ins., at the withers; and as, like the well-known gayal, it has a ridge running along the middle of the back, it appears even taller; Mr. Ditmas's bull measured 7 ft. 3¾ ins. to the top of this dorsal ridge. The back is curiously arched, forming a fairly continuous curve from the nose to the base of the tail. The skull is massive, and is surmounted by a large semi-cylindrical crest, rising above the base of the horns. The muzzle is large and full. The horns in the adult bull are, like the skull that bears them, very strong and massive; they extend outwards from the head, and the points are turned upwards and inwards.—A good head is shown at the Zoo, on the wall opposite the stall in which the gaur is confined.—The colour of the animals is a very deep brownish-black, with the exception of a light tuft on the forehead between the horns, and four "white stockings." There is no dewlap in either sex.

"Jack," as the new arrival is called, is but a small beast, standing, as nearly as we can guess, between thirteen and fourteen hands. But if it be true, as alleged, that the bull does not attain his full growth until his tenth year, he has plenty of time to reach even the enormous proportions that we have mentioned. At the present time he is in very bad condition, being indeed little more than a bag of bones, the result of his long journey, during which, for some reason which we cannot understand, he appears to have been fed principally on bananas and other fruit; but we believe he already shows a marked improvement, and he certainly takes kindly to the good clover hay with which he is supplied, and appears to have settled down comfortably in his new quarters in the Antelope house, in the stall next to those occupied by the Indian cattle belonging to the Prince of Wales. He shows no signs of wildness, in the sense of being frightened by his surroundings, but at the same time appears to be anything but an amiable character, as he will not allow his keeper to enter his stall, and has rather a startling trick of suddenly striking at the bars, in a very suggestive manner, when any one is looking at him. If, as we hope may be the case, he should live to maturity, it will be most interesting to watch his development, and especially to see whether constant care and attention will not have the effect of rendering him, if not tame, at least amenable to discipline. Should he, however, retain his present ferocity as he increases in size and weight, he will be anything but a pleasant animal to manage.

THE ART CONGRESS AT EDINBURGH.

THE National Association for the Advancement of Art and its application to Industry, which held its first Congress last year in Liverpool, has, during the past week, been enjoying itself and enlightening the world in the city of Edinburgh. An omniscient American prophet warned those people in the United States who are thinking of following the example of the English Congress-going artists that the Edinburgh meeting was to be given over wholly to amateurs, and that all artists would certainly wash their hands of it. He has proved to be no better informed than the ordinary American correspondent in England who pretends to possess the most accurate information of the tastes and habits of every living person from Royalty down. Papers have been communicated to the Edinburgh Congress by Messrs. Briton Rivière, Watts, Hodgson, Horsley, Yeames, W. B. Richmond, and Onslow Ford, amongst Royal Academicians. The decorative artists have been represented by their prophets, Mr. William Morris and Mr. Walter Crane; Messrs. D. W. Stevenson, Hole, Mackay, and Wingate spoke for the Royal Scottish Academy. Amongst architects, Messrs. Statham, Blashill, Rowand Anderson, and Sedding read important papers. The interests of sculpture were discussed by Mr. Roscoe Mullins, Mr. Stirling Lee, and Mr. George Simonds. The promoters of Home Arts and Industries were present in great force. Three Art Professors attended the Congress as spectators, and finally the despised body of art critics was well represented by Mr. Andrew Lang and Mr. Spielmann. The foregoing catalogue of names will suffice to show that, so far from leading men in the world of art abstaining this year from taking part in the Congress, the reverse has been the case. On the other hand, Edinburgh does not possess a population comparable in number to that which throngs about the mouth of the Mersey, and the number of persons attending the Congress has shown a considerable falling off as compared with last year. Names and numbers are, however, of little importance. The questions that have to be mainly considered are what was said by the speakers and was it worth saying?

The Marquess of Lorne, in his presidential address, naturally disclaimed any intention of attempting to rival the masterly review of the present position of art in this country with which the Liverpool Congress was opened by Sir Frederick Leighton. After briefly replying to those who object to the holding of any Congresses whatever, and especially of a Congress devoted to the discussion of problems connected with the development of art, he proceeded to review and discuss the opinions expressed at the Liverpool Congress, and the more useful and practicable proposals there made. He criticized, not undeservedly, some of the architectural monstrosities with which the grey metropolis of the North has of late encumbered herself; and, in a light and pleasant manner, he opened the way for the heavier professional discussions which were to follow.

The solid business of the meeting began with Mr. Briton Rivière's admirable address, wherein he stated, with great clearness and force, the different points of view from which a work of art is regarded by artists and the public. Artists ask first, "How is it done?" The public inquires, "What does it mean?" He then proceeded to discuss the effect of modern science upon art, and showed how the artist is often forced to sacrifice scientific accuracy to artistic necessity. The photographs of animals caught in rapid motion are of little use to artists, because the artist paints for the human eye, and not for the delight of a drop-shutting camera. Mr. Rivière's address will doubtless attract, as it deserves, more attention from artists and the public than any other recent utterance by the prophets of art.

Mr. G. F. Watts once more contributed to the Congress proceedings a paper full of suggestion. He lamented that art is not nowadays felt to possess any real and natural place amongst the constituents of our national dignity. The uglier the surroundings of life, the more need is there for art; but the Puritanism of the past two centuries has killed out many artistic traditions which might now be flourishing; only the pictorial art survives and produces pictures in unhealthy profusion. "Art, child of leisure and the sun," is, moreover, an essential thing for a people to produce if it has any ambition to be remembered as great by future generations. Tyre, Sidon, and Carthage are little more than names. The artistic productions of otherwise forgotten Etruria keep her memory green to the present day. The self-same lesson was inculcated by Mr. Philip Rathbone in a paper wherein he greatly railed against the dulness and blundering stupidity of Municipal Councils, and more especially the Town Council of Liverpool. If the experience of other cities is worth anything, the Piccadilly Omphalos, by which the Metropolitan Board of Works is to be commemorated as long as Aberdeen granite lasts, is likely to be surpassed in monstrosity by whatever the London County Council may hereafter, in its turn, create.

Last year the outsiders fell upon the Royal Academy, and denounced it and all its works. This year the Academicians have turned and rent South Kensington. The Government Art Schools have failed, so said Mr. Hodgson and Mr. Horsley, and no one was found to disagree with them. The former speaker justly protested against the uniform and stereotyped system of education decreed by the existing laws. Mr. Horsley further and very justly criticized the action of the Government in employing a foreigner, resident in England, both to design our coinage and to commemorate in bronze one of our greatest national heroes. But when he proceeded to protest against artists studying from the nude model, the audience vigorously protested, and a Quaker lady arose and tore his argument to pieces.

More than one speaker, notably Mr. Onslow Ford, called for the appointment of a Minister of the Fine Arts, as though we were not already overburdened with Government interference. Socialism in one form or another is always liable to insinuate itself where two or three artists are gathered together. The Liverpool Congress laid itself very justly open to criticism on this score. Bookbinders who prided themselves on insinuating their souls into their bindings; decorators not content with making good decoration, but primarily desirous (so they said) of giving expression to ideals too lofty for ordinary man—all sorts of unwholesome faddists strutted for a while upon the novel stage in a most unedifying manner. What they said has fortunately been printed, and has since received well-merited castigation. There was less of this kind of thing at Edinburgh. One speaker after another stated, in plain enough terms, that the first business of a craftsman is to attain mastery in his craft. However fine his ideals and moral aims may be, they are no compensation, they count for nothing in the balance if his execution be bad. If this is the case in the fine arts, it is much more so in decoration. If a painter may not reckon to his credit a noble conception, unless he is able to give it clear and beautiful expression, how much chance has a bookbinder of forgiveness, however great his homage for the author whose book he binds, if his binding be bad in itself? If the binding be good, the pages within it may be blank, and it will make no difference. Let it not be understood, however, that the Edinburgh Congress was pure of Socialism. It sinned in this respect, but it sinned less than its predecessor. An Art Congress is not a political platform, and its promoters must be warned not to let it become one, unless they desire that it be doomed to disruption and swiftly following death. The warning has, however, been received, and will, no doubt, be acted upon. Socialism, in one form or another, is only too much of a political factor already. Socialist artists will find themselves most unwelcome guests in the large manufacturing towns, where their hosts are the bloated capitalists by whose foresight those towns have been made.

To chronicle all the panaceas for Philistinism proposed by the various speakers at the Congress would be to make too great a demand upon a reader's patience. Sir James Gowans, the Lord Dean of Guild, would form in every great city a Court of Taste, which should possess the power of veto upon the erection of any building judged by it to be hideous. Thank Heaven, no such interference with public liberty is conceivably possible. More than one architect called for legislation to prevent any man from acting as an architect without a diploma granted by an established examining body. Is the examination craze destined to invade every possible branch of human activity? Wiser was Mr. Statham in his excellent suggestions about the laying-out of towns. The distinction which he drew between the accidental picturesqueness of mediæval cities, and the bungling and conscious imitations of it which are in favour with certain people, was one which cannot be too strongly insisted upon. The shortest distance between two points is the natural line for a street. No one would lay out a new town in level country with narrow crooked lanes. The proportion between the height of houses and the width of the street is likewise an important consideration. Many mediæval streets are picturesque notwithstanding their narrowness, but their builders would certainly have made them broad if they could. The limits imposed by walls of fortification necessarily cramped the space available for roadways—a matter of little importance when wheeled vehicles were few. We live under different conditions, and any art we have must arise out of, and harmonize with, those conditions.

Mr. Yeames protested against exhibitions and competition generally, and dwelt, not without reason, upon their injurious effect upon art. But these, again, are the conditions under which artists have to work, and conditions of life can only be changed very gradually. If you want art, Mr. Ruskin used to say, you must turn your social system upside down and make the world a totally different kind of place from what it now is. The cart could not be set more accurately before the horse. No nation or people ever lived for art. Nations, like individuals, have to procure their bread and butter first, and when that is done may take their pleasure. Art has to come after the work of the world. The form it takes depends upon the nature of that work at a given date. Artists, of all people, have nothing to do with altering the conditions under which the world's work is done. Their business is to provide pleasure and delight for men in their hours of leisure. If they cannot do this, let them make way for others who can, and let them silently turn to some honest trade for a living. When Mr. Yeames protests against medal-hunting and the opportunities afforded for it by French exhibitions and the like, we are heartily at one with him; but the system of exhibition may indeed be much changed, but scarcely abolished. Modern needs demand it.

Amongst the remaining papers, two by Mr. Starkie Gardner on technical subjects will be of permanent value in their printed form. What the sculptors had to say was likewise of interest; but, as a rule, they look for too much from Government patronage and legislative enactments. We do not expect, in the near future, to behold municipalities spending public funds upon sculptural decorations for public buildings. Sculpture must, in the main, strive to attract the attention of generous rich men. Undoubtedly it would be far wiser, and would keep the donor's memory far more green, if many of those who now leave legacies to demoralizing so-called philanthropic institutions were to expend such sums upon the decoration of the cities within which their lives have been passed. The completion of the sculptured decoration of St. George's Hall would probably be a more actually useful work than the foundation of two orphan asylums. Architects, as Mr. Mullins suggested, would do well to provide plenty of space for sculpture in their buildings. Mr. Stirling Lee, ill treated as he has been by the Liverpool Corporation, has gained knowledge by bitter experience, and his paper, if read between the lines, was perhaps one of the most valuable contributions which the Congress called forth.

The foregoing brief epitome will suffice to show what were the tendencies which found chief expression at the Edinburgh Congress. On all hands the cry was for better education of the public. In this matter artists must lead the way. The public taste always lags behind the taste of the artists at any given day. The better they educate themselves the more wide and enlightened will be the support they receive.

MONEY MATTERS.

THE money market has been quiet throughout the week, with a gradual and steady rise in rates. Almost every day there were rumours that a large amount of gold would be sent to Brazil. But the rumours have not proved true, and, in fact, more gold has been received from abroad than has been exported. The withdrawals for Scotland, too, have proved smaller as yet than was anticipated. Still the reserve of the Bank of England is very low. The Scotch demand will amount to about three-quarters of a million, and at any moment there may be large exports; while imports on a considerable scale are not to be looked for, unless the great financial houses again come to the rescue of the market. The probability appears to be, therefore, that the rates of interest and discount will continue to rise, and will be very firm all through this month. But the general impression at the same time is that there will be no serious stringency. Apparently the large coinage of silver this year is greatly diminishing the demand that would otherwise have fallen upon the London money market for coin. The rise in prices and wages necessitates a largely expanded coin circulation, and evidently the new silver has satisfied the demand to a greater extent than most people were prepared to find.

The price of silver has again risen considerably this week. Business was done on Thursday at as much as 43½d. per oz. The demand for India, China, Japan, and Cochin China has been considerable all through the year. And it is expected that at the coming Session of Congress the amount of silver to be coined in the United States will be doubled. But the real cause of the recent rise is the buying by the Mint. As long as that buying continues the rise must go on. The half-sovereigns coined previously to the present reign are now being withdrawn, and it is understood that those of the present reign will in due course also be withdrawn. And the Chancellor of the Exchequer is seeing how far silver can take the place of half-sovereigns, the latter being a much more costly coin. Silver obviously meets the needs of the working classes better than gold. But whether the well-to-do classes will be content to carry about much of the cumbersome silver coins remains to be seen. And it is to be anticipated that, if the silver circulation is very largely increased, there will before long be a loud outcry from the bankers. As long as trade is active silver will circulate freely; but, as soon as trade begins to fall off, it will be paid into the banks by their customers all over the country. If the banks could be sure that the Bank of England would take the silver from them, they need not trouble themselves. But is it likely that the Bank of England will do so? And, if it does not, what are the banks to do with a mass of coins which they can neither force again into circulation nor treat as a reserve?

The stock markets have continued quiet. The fortnightly settlement occupied the first three days, and, as yesterday was a holiday, business practically came to an end on Thursday evening. Therefore, few cared to enter into fresh engagements. On the Berlin Bourse, too, the monthly Liquidation was going on, and yesterday the Liquidation on the Paris Bourse began. All this exercised a temporary influence. A more permanent cause for the pause in speculation is the uncertainty respecting the money market. Then, again, speculation has been carried too far in Berlin. Prices everywhere are exceedingly high. The rise in prices and wages that is going on at home and abroad threatens to increase very considerably the working expenses of industrial Companies. And the proposed reorganization of the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fé Company has deepened the distrust of American railroad management. If bonds so lately brought out by one of the greatest London houses are worth no more than they are now represented to be, what is the value of any divisional bond of any American railroad Company? So people are indignantly asking. And, consequently, an immense mass of American railroad bonds has been sold this week. Lastly, drought and over-speculation have combined to bring about a pause in the market for South African land and mining shares. Doubtless, too, the attention of the public is being diverted from the older securities to the shares of new Companies which are coming out in such multitudes, the newest fancy being Founders' shares.

Dealings in South African securities of all kinds have been on so large a scale for a long time past that practically it is found impossible to arrange the accounts at the ordinary settlements. Very many brokers and jobbers in consequence are weeks, and even months, behindhand in their settlements, and practically do not know how they actually stand. The difficulty, no doubt, is increased by the fact that this department of the Stock Exchange is not admitted to the Stock Exchange Clearing House. In any case the result is such a confusion that business has been greatly checked of late, and that many brokers are unwilling to continue their risks. The matter is attracting a good deal of attention this week, as one broker, unable to obtain delivery of shares purchased for a client, bought them in the market, inflicting loss upon innocent persons.

The opposition to the proposed reorganization of the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fé Railroad Company is growing stronger. The committee appointed to look after the interests of the bondholders has had two interviews with Messrs. Baring Brothers & Co., from the second of which they came away very much disappointed, and even angry. The members are at present strongly indisposed to accept the plan, and it looks, consequently, as if it would be rejected by the British bondholders at all events, and that, therefore, a receiver will have to be appointed. The chief objections of the bondholders are: first, that the shareholders, who are nearly all Americans, are asked to bear no part of the loss, the whole of it being thrown upon the bondholders, who are in considerable numbers Europeans; secondly, that the floating debt is placed on an equal footing with the bonded debt, which was supposed to have a priority; and, thirdly, that the treatment of the different classes of bondholders is not equitable.

The County Council has this week appeared as a borrower for the first time. It proposes to raise a million of stock bearing 2½ per cent. interest, the minimum price being 88. This would yield just 2l. 16s. 9½d. per cent. The market, however, takes a more favourable view of the credit of the Council than it ventured to do itself. It observes that the Government Two and a Half per Cents are much higher, and therefore it argues that this new stock is entirely too cheap. The result is that, even before the time for tendering has come, there is a premium of 3¼. If the allotments are at this latter price—that is 91¼—the yield will be under 2¾ per cent. It would be interesting to know who are the eager buyers of this stock. It seems hardly credible that bona fide investors are satisfied with a yield of less than 2¾ per cent. for their money.

The iron "boom" continues. All manufactured branches of the steel and steel iron trades are exceedingly active. It is said that orders are so numerous that new ones cannot be executed for a considerable time to come, and the demand, therefore, for pig iron is steadily increasing. It is predicted, indeed, that the diminution in the stocks will be on an extraordinary scale during the current month. The demand for coal, too, is greatly increasing. The workpeople, seeing this extraordinary improvement, are very naturally demanding a rise of wages, and the demand is very generally being conceded. At the same time, the workpeople are asking for shorter hours of labour. On this point the employers are much more likely to stand out. And it is possible that a dispute may, therefore, arise. In any case, the rise in wages, together with the great increase in the demand, caused the price of Scotch pig iron to rise at one time this week to a little over 3*l.* a ton. There has since been a slight decline. But the expectation is that the advance will continue. The trade is very active upon the Continent, more particularly in Germany, and a decided improvement has likewise set in in the United States.

EXHIBITIONS.

AT Mr. McLean's Gallery the annual winter exhibition is not crowded with works, but contains few examples which are entirely insignificant. Unfortunately, the two largest and most prominent pictures it is out of our power to commend. It is simply deplorable to find Sir John Millais willing to exhibit such a production as his "Afternoon Tea" (19), in which we look in vain for those qualities of dignified design and capacity of execution which have made his name in the past so famous. We say it gravely, and we say it with all respect, it would be far better for Sir John Millais to rest upon his well-deserved laurels than to undermine the loyalty which an elder generation must always feel towards him by such puerilities as these. From Mr. Long, the other prominent offender at Mr. McLean's, we have received no such favours in the past that we should approach his "Choosing a Deity" (13) delicately. It deserves the worst that the enemies of the conventional English school can say of it. It is a wretched piece of mock-antique, painted without science or feeling, and on a ridiculously large scale. If this be not the feeblest Long yet supplied to an infatuated public, our memory of past delights is failing us.

But some of the smaller pictures are charming. There is a genre-piece by the Munich painter, Herr Poetzelberger, called "Love's Pleadings" (16), which could hardly be better of its kind. On a windy autumn day, when the air is full of the golden flutter of leaves, a young cavalier has taken shelter in the corner of a deserted gateway, and is pleading his cause with a girl. The expression of the faces is excellent, and very good, too, the impatience of the lover's horse. The whole composition, in a low key, is very prettily painted. Mr. Blinks's jockey and hunting-field studies are always welcome. "Autumn Evening, Arran" (2), is a sentimental landscape by Mr. MacWhirter; Mr. Hook, too, has been painting the wild light on the sea-pools and windy lochs of Arran (20) in his radiant way. An amusing piece of genre is M. Chevallier's "Critical Moment" (10), an eager abbé trying to photograph a scarlet company of acolytes, headed by a most pompous beadle. In M. Munkacsy's "Flirtation" (11) the woman leaning violently back from her tambour is well, if hastily, painted; but the man is poor. Seldom is seen in London so delicate, pure, and graceful a specimen of Mlle. Rosa Bonheur's best work as the small "Royal Stag" (12), wandering in the forest of Fontainebleau. "The Return" (14) is one of Mr. Marcus Stone's refined and pathetic compositions, bathed in sensibility and green-coloured light. Here is a charming Corot (15). Of sea-pieces we have to praise Mr. C. Napier Hemy's fresh and broad "Clearing the Net" (25), and in stronger terms Mr. Henry Moore's exquisite "Fresh Morning off the Isle of Wight" (32). Other pleasant examples are Mr. F. D. Millet's "Wandering Thoughts" (35), a lady turning away from the piano; Mr. Robert Macbeth's "Fish To-day?" (36), painted this year, but quite in his early and better manner; two gaudily coloured but cleverly composed and drawn scenes of modern Venetian life, by Stefano Novo; a Gerome, "The Golden Age" (9), a nude nymph piping to a dancing child, in which the flesh is much too smooth and china-like; a Jan van Beers, "An Interlude in the Dance" (40), a woman prone on a tiger-skin, with a tortoise beside her, of an indubitable cleverness; and "The Return of the Exiles" (48), by C. Delort, a clever piece of narrative, in which a widow and her heir are seen to enter the deserted salon of their château, only to find it absolutely empty, dirty, and dishonoured, cobwebs pendant from the mouldings, and the vast pier-glass stained and starred.

At Messrs. Dowdeswell's Galleries, where last spring we saw so interesting a collection of pictures by Modern Dutch and French painters, there is now on view an exhibition of the same masters which is rather a pale reflection of what was then brought together. As moonlight is to sunlight, so are these mild, and in some cases, we must conjecture, these more than dubious, examples to the Corots and Troyons, the Maris and the Mauves, that we saw last May. Still, there are some pleasing specimens. The "Landscape near Ornans" (14) is a beautiful and solemn example of Courbet's mannered style. The copper domes shine out of a very fine Pasini, "The Halt" (29). A Dutch war-painter, G. H. Breitner, gives us some spirited impressions of the manœuvres of 1889 (44, 47). A fine Harpignies is "Sunset" (5). Mr. Peppercorn, who finds himself a solitary exile among these foreigners, pushes the style of Corot to the last extreme in his almost comic "Twilight" (21). Among the Dutchmen Herr Mesdag's "Moonlight" (59) is rather an agreeable variant on his effective but too monotonous sea-pieces. In the place of honour is a large "Autumn Evening" (73), by Theodor de Bock. In the manner of Israels, but gayer and less dispiriting, is a "Girl Knitting" (65), by G. Henkes. A curious effect of orange and olive is presented by Zilcken's landscape called "Sunset and Rain."

But, on the whole, the collection is not sufficiently representative of what is best in the work of the modern Frenchman and Dutchman to justify the exhibition. In the adjoining gallery a couple of hundred small water-colour drawings, by English artists, are hung. The spirit of the Christmas card has hung over these smooth, pretty, gay, and insipid little paintings. The best names signed to them are those of Mr. Blair Leighton, Mr. C. Gregory, Mr. E. K. Johnson, Miss Alice Havers, and Miss Mary Gow.

RECENT CONCERTS.

THE month of October does not generally witness so many concerts as have taken place in it this year. Formerly the resumption of the Saturday Concerts at the Crystal Palace and of the Monday and Saturday Popular Concerts at St. James's Hall marked the beginning of the winter musical season, but this year several concerts, of more or less importance, have taken place in the course of the three first weeks of the month, and, judging by the way in which they have been attended, the concert-going portion of the London public must have returned to town unusually early. The first in chronological order which demand some notice were the four concerts given by Otto Hegner on October 2, 5, 9, and 12, the dates of which were fixed so early in the month owing to the departure of the little pianist for America, where it is to be hoped that he will not meet with the same fate as befell his predecessor, Josef Hofmann. The first and third of these were Orchestral concerts, the band being that of the Amateur Orchestral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. George Mount; the remainder were devoted to pianoforte recitals. As the dates of the last two of Hegner's concerts coincided with the Leeds Festival, comparatively few musicians could be present at them. This was the less to be regretted as the programmes for the most part consisted of selections in which the young pianist had been previously heard more than once, but at the first Orchestral concert some interest was created by his performance of the solo part in Weber's Concertstück—a work which, for some unaccountable reason, is now seldom heard in public. It cannot be said that Otto Hegner added to his reputation by his playing on this occasion. Weber's romantic composition demands greater command over the keyboard than can be expected from a mere child, however gifted; and, though the performance, so far as the execution of the technical difficulties of the work was concerned, left little to be desired, yet the want of the higher qualities of interpretation and feeling was felt throughout. The only other feature of much interest was the singing of Herr Max Heinrich, who was in remarkably good voice. Besides the songs set down for him in the programme, he replaced Mme. Valleria, who was too ill to attend, in a manner which gave every satisfaction to the audience. At the Recital on the 5th Otto Hegner introduced an extremely well-written composition of his own, a Suite in five movements—namely, a Preludium, Gavotte, Menuett, Aria, and Finale. Without giving signs of much individuality, which it would be unreasonable to expect from one so young, the Suite is throughout musicianly and clever, and would do credit to an older composer. It was received with much applause, in response to which the composer played a somewhat commonplace March, an earlier and inferior work of his own. At his last concert he performed Chopin's Concerto in E minor, two of Henselt's Studies, and a Valse Caprice of Rubinstein's. On this occasion he was again assisted by the Amateur Orchestral Society, as well as by Herr Heinrich and the brilliant young singer whose pleasure it is to be known as "Nikita"—a style which, it is to be presumed, is adopted in order to set the audience wondering whether she is "Mrs. or Miss."

On the 21st a vast audience assembled at the Albert Hall for Mr. Kuhe's concert. Though the concert-giver was assisted by such artists as Mme. Patey, Lady Hallé, Messrs. Edward Lloyd, Barrington Foote, and Leo Stern, it would be absurd to deny that the majority of the crowd which filled every part of the great building was attracted by the announcement that Mme. Patti would sing. Though the prima-donna has apparently, as far as England is concerned, retired from the operatic stage, where she first appeared more than twenty-eight years ago, her name is still one to conjure with, and her singing remains as fascinating as it was when she was in her first youth. Time has treated her beautiful voice tenderly, and though the upper register has perhaps lost some of its brilliancy, her lower notes have developed a roundness of tone which at one time was wanting. Artistically, her singing of the slow movement "Ah! non credea," from the final rondo of La Sonnambula, was by far the best performance of the evening; but the enthusiastic audience insisted upon encoring all her songs, so that in addition to taking part with Mme. Patey in Rossini's "Quis est homo," and to singing Gounod's "Ave Maria"—the effect of which, by the way, was much marred by the noise produced by Herr Louis Engel's harmonium accompaniment—she was forced to give the familiar "Last Rose of Summer," and Bishop's "Home, sweet Home." After Mme. Patti had once complied with the wishes of the audience, encores were demanded after every number. The programme did not contain any novelty, but was chiefly composed of more or less familiar songs and ballads by Gounod, Handel, A. G. Thomas, Tosti, and Wallace. Lady Hallé played an uninteresting Caprice Hongrois by Joachim Raff, a Moto Perpetuo by Ferdinand Ries, and Spohr's Barcarolle; and the orchestra, under the conductorship of Herr Wilhelm Ganz, played the overtures to Egmont, Le Domino Noir, and Zampa.

The first Saturday Concert at the Crystal Palace, which took place on the afternoon of the 19th, is always a red-letter day for amateurs, and accordingly a large audience assembled, attracted mainly by the presence in the programme of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. To praise the performances of Mr. Manns's orchestra at this time of day would be entirely a work of supererogation; fortunately they are familiar to all lovers of good music. Mr. Manns's readings are sometimes different to those of other conductors, but it is to be presumed that he not only has traditions of his own, but also has the advantage of the advice of the erudite "G.," whose analyses are so well-known to frequenters of these concerts, and who has made the study of Beethoven and all connected with him a labour of love. At the concert on the 19th the Symphony was taken somewhat slower throughout than is often the case; but it is known that there has always been a tendency in England to hurry tempi, and probably Mr. Manns's reading was nearer to the Vienna traditions than the more familiar rendering. The only novelty in the programme was a short orchestral interlude from Massenet's new opera Esclarmonde, a work which is enjoying considerable success in Paris, where its composer is more appreciated than in this country. The Interlude presents nothing remarkable, and was hardly worth playing, save as a matter of curiosity. The other orchestral numbers were Bennett's beautiful "Wood-nymph" Overture—one of the composer's most delicate and graceful inspirations—and the Overture to Wagner's "Tannhäuser," played in commemoration of the first performance of the opera, which took place at Dresden, October 19th, 1845. The pianist was Madame Roger-Miclos, an extremely brilliant and able performer, who comes to this country with a Parisian reputation. She was heard in Saint-Saëns's Second Concerto, a work which, though it has been much cried down and abused, gains at every successive hearing, and is now an established favourite both with artists and with that section of the musical public which is willing to recognize that there may be some merit in compositions not by Germans. Her solos were a Study by Pfeiffer, "Inquiétude," and Chopin's Andante Spianato and Polonaise in E flat. Mme. Roger-Miclos has a powerful touch, and her execution is not only technically excellent, but characterized by extraordinary brilliancy. Whether she possesses higher qualities than these her selection of solos did not give an opportunity of judging. The vocalist was Mr. Lloyd. On last Saturday the programme included a Symphony in B flat, by Dr. Bernhard Scholtz; a work which, though composed five years ago, had not been previously heard in England. Dr. Scholtz is not a very youthful composer. He was born in 1835, and has for some years enjoyed a limited reputation in Germany as a respectable and accomplished, if not very original, musician. His compositions embrace every style, though none of them have won for the composer more than a local celebrity. The Symphony performed last Saturday is one of his most successful works. After hearing it the cause of the composer's comparative obscurity becomes clear, for from beginning to end the music comes from the head instead of the heart; and, excellent as it no doubt is as a piece of construction and composition, it possesses neither originality of ideas nor of treatment, without which no work can be expected to win a composer lasting fame. The Symphony consists of the usual four movements, but none of them produced much impression. The first, an Allegro, is noticeable for its extremely clever construction; but the subjects are full of reminiscences, and the orchestration is apt to be monotonous. The Scherzo and Trio pleased most; in them the composer is more genial and natural, though even here his originality is doubtful. The remainder of the concert calls for brief mention. The orchestra gave magnificent performances of Beethoven's "Coriolan" Overture, and Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," and Señor Albeniz played Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto with his usual charm of touch, but without much insight into the feeling of the work. In his other solos, three short compositions of his own, he was, as usual, very successful, and much applauded. The vocalist, Mlle. Elvira Gambogi, received an encore for her singing of Gounod's "Ave Maria."

On Monday evening last St. James's Hall was once more filled with a large audience of the regular habitués of Mr. Chappell's Popular Concert. The performers were all old favourites—Mme. Néruda, Mme. Haas, Miss Liza Lehmann, Messrs. Straus, Ries, and Piatti; and, needless to say, they were all greeted with warm applause. The programme only contained one novelty—namely, Dvořák's String Quartet in E major, Op. 80, a work which, though new to the Popular Concert audiences, had already been heard twice before in London. It is one of the latest compositions of the Bohemian composer, but it is not one of his best. With the exception of the Andante con Moto, it lacks inspiration, and displays constantly a straining after effect and a deliberate eccentricity which become almost wearying to the listener. Mme. Haas chose for her solos Brahms's Rhapsodie in B minor, Op. 79, No. 1, and Chopin's seldom-played Nocturne, Op. 9, No. 3. She was more successful in the latter than in the former. Brahms's pianoforte music demands, above all things, great vigour and energy, neither of which is a characteristic of Mme. Haas's style. Miss Lehmann sang with perfect charm and finish James Hook's song, "Oh! listen to the voice of Love," besides Lieder by Emmerich and Meyer-Helmünd, in the latter of which she was encored. The art of singing the florid and ornate English ballads of the end of the eighteenth century has become so lost nowadays that Miss Lehmann's singing of Hook's graceful song must have come like a revelation to many of her audience. It is to be hoped that she will continue her researches into this class of music; there must be many songs by Arne and his successors which would be well worth reviving.

REVIEWS.

THIS is, on the whole, though possessing some superficial merits to which we have referred before, a bad book upon a good subject. M. Latour has expended much conscientious labour upon the question to which his attention was directed by the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences. He has thoroughly ransacked so much, at any rate, of the literature of the question as is accessible in French. Note-book in hand, he has consulted with equal deference Vattel, Hübner, and the latest Thèse du Doctorat. But his style is cumbrous, no sense of humour saves him from lapsing into truisms, and, worst of all, he starts with no adequate conception of the topic with which he is about to deal. Of M. Latour's truisms the following are fairly selected samples:—

"Beaucoup de villes doivent leur développement, ou même leur existence, au voisinage de la mer." "L'individu est en lutte contre l'individu. Pour prévenir à cet état de choses, il est utile de déterminer d'une façon précise et équitable les droits de chacun et par cela même ses devoirs." "La guerre peut venir rompre l'équilibre existant antérieurement entre deux états." "La guerre a toujours existé. C'est un mal inévitable qui durera aussi longtemps que les sociétés, et ne périra qu'avec elles."

To abstain from platitudes is a rule of general obligation. A duty more especially binding upon the author of a monograph is to map out accurately the boundaries of his topic and to exercise constant self-control in keeping within them. This duty has been conspicuously violated by M. Latour. He seems unconscious of the limits of his subject, and leaves it only half explored to wander over ground already occupied by other labourers. A work upon la mer territoriale—i.e. upon those spaces of salt water over which rights are claimed by the State which owns the adjacent land—should distinguish between the several classes of such waters, and discuss the various rights which are claimed over each. The simplest case, that of ports, harbours, and mouths of rivers, over which the right exercised by the contiguous State is admittedly one of ownership, should be taken first. Close seas, straits, and interoceanic canals should come next. "Littoral waters" should follow, with a discussion of such questions as—the distance from the shore to which these waters extend, and whether the right exercisable over them is one of ownership or merely of jurisdiction. It would then be necessary to consider how far the principles applicable to such waters may be applied also to large bays and "Kings' chambers," and, lastly, to inquire whether any territorial rights are recognized at the present day over the so-called "narrow seas" or over any portions of the open ocean. M. Latour deals with most of these questions, but he does so in a disorderly and often inadequate manner, which is not surprising, since his energies are largely expended upon matters with which he should have had no concern. A catalogue of some of the extraneous topics with which M. Latour's treatise is needlessly distended may be useful as showing the lengths to which irrelevancy may be carried by any one who does not take the precaution of mastering his subject before he begins to write. It is difficult to trace a connexion of ideas between the topic of territorial seas and the theory of a maritime balance of power; yet this theory is discussed by our author, who seems to suppose that it is in some way supported by the Declaration of Paris. The Channel Tunnel is equally alien to the scope of the work, as are the physical and economical questions suggested by the Suez Canal, by the attempted canal through the Isthmus of Panama, and by the ingenious, but apparently impracticable, scheme of M. Kerviler for nullifying the British tenure of Gibraltar by piercing what he describes as "the isthmus of Languedoc." The privileges enjoyed by fishing-boats, in not being expected to carry the papers which are demanded from larger vessels, and in being, as a rule, exempt from capture in time of war, exist outside of territorial waters as well as within them. The flags and papers which must be carried by sea-going vessels are still further from having any special connexion with la mer territoriale. But all these topics are discussed by M. Latour, who also gives comparative tables of the commercial shipping of the principal maritime States, sets out fully the International Code of Signals, goes minutely into the procedure by which the French Customs are enforced, and even deals with the conditions upon which goods in transit through France by railway, with an ulterior destination, are exempt from duty. It is, no doubt, the case that several of the rights and obligations of a State, with reference to its territorial waters, arise only in time of war. These are, with questionable propriety, discussed in a separate department of the book; and here M. Latour indulges in a series of disquisitions, a mere enumeration of which will show how entirely they are out of place. He considers the lawfulness of the employment of torpedoes, the possibility of securing submarine cables from destruction by belligerents, the policy of the Declaration of Paris against privateering and against the capture of enemies' property under a neutral flag, the theory and practice of blockade, the law and procedure of the various maritime States in prize causes, and the punishment of spies. A final chapter, in which we are led to expect a summing up of "les conclusions qui semblent ressortir de cette étude," is mainly occupied by the text of a treaty made in 1886 between France and Denmark as to the property of deceased sailors, and by paragraphs upon the Geneva Convention for the better treatment of the wounded, and upon arbitration as a substitute for war.

Stripped of platitudes and irrelevancies, M. Latour's work is of meagre dimensions. It contains, no doubt, some useful and interesting information, but is disfigured by indications of ill will to England, such as are too common in French writers on maritime questions, and by a good many inaccurate statements. M. Latour is, for instance, mistaken in supposing that the British Government has shifted its ground as to the international character of the Suez Canal. The announcement made by Lord Derby in 1877 contained an express reference to the determination of Great Britain to keep open the short waterway to India. It is not the case that the Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act of 1878 identifies the three-mile limit with the range of cannon. The Customs Act of 1833, cited by M. Latour with reference to the limits within which foreign vessels can be seized for smuggling, has long ago been repealed, and the topic is governed by a very different set of provisions, to be found in the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876.

The views of the author on the topics to which he ought to have confined himself, so far as they can be disentangled from his utterances on things in general, may be summarized as follows. Harbours and small bays are the property of the State within the territory of which they are situated, as also are mers enclavées—i.e. such seas as are entirely enclosed within the territory of a single State. Seas similarly enclosed, except that they communicate with open waters by a narrow strait, both shores of which belong to the enclosing State, are subject merely to the jurisdiction of that State. Over large gulfs, such as that of Conception in Newfoundland, and over those wide spaces of water enclosed by a line drawn from headland to headland, which are known as "Kings' chambers," M. Latour questions the existence of even a right of jurisdiction. Littoral waters are not, he maintains, the property of the State which owns the adjacent territory; though he finds some difficulty in explaining, otherwise than as a consequence of ownership, the unquestioned exclusive right of fishery in them, and he concedes only such rights of jurisdiction over them as are necessary for the security of the territory. He criticizes with some severity, and perhaps with some reason, the claim asserted by the Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act to apply the whole criminal law of England to foreign vessels passing through littoral waters; and he objects to measuring such waters for all purposes as extending three miles from low-water mark. He would apparently vary the limit according to circumstances, ascertaining it, as a rule, by the maximum range of cannon, which he reckons as being, at the present day, eight miles. Within this distance from a neutral coast hostilities would be prohibited and captures would be invalid. He would extend to a greater distance the right of visit for the purpose of enforcing sanitary regulations and for the protection of the revenue. There is, of course, much to be said for fixing the limit of territorial waters with reference to the range of cannon. On the other hand, it must be remembered that the three-mile limit "holds the field." It has been recognized for so many purposes, alike in treaties, in practice, in judicial decisions, and in legislation, as to have acquired a position independent of improvements in the military art. It is so nearly, if not quite, a part of international law that any extension of it should take place, if at all, by general diplomatic agreement. M. Latour makes only a passing allusion to the jurisdiction once claimed over the "narrow seas." He devotes only a few lines to the monstrous claim of Russia to close the Northern Pacific; and says nothing of the practical revival of that claim within the last few years by the United States in the interest of their seal fisheries.

It may be gathered from what has been said that M. Latour's book is best adapted to be used by those who are already familiar with the subject of which it treats. Readers who are able to sift the wheat from the chaff may here and there find in it some grains of information which might otherwise have escaped their notice. It is, for instance, not common knowledge that the Gazette de Moscou founded upon the conclusion of the Suez Canal Convention of 1888 a claim for the neutralization of Gibraltar, in order that "la Méditerranée deviendrait une mer réellement libre." One of M. Latour's longest and most justifiable digressions relates to the history of the Suez Canal. On its international character, apart from convention, he gives an uncertain sound, but characteristically misunderstands the argument of those who would assimilate its character to that of a natural strait. This view implies neither that the isthmus was formerly covered by the sea, nor that the imposition of transit dues by the Canal Company is unlawful. It does imply that the Canal might, apart from convention, be blockaded by an enemy of Turkey; but this is a proposition the truth of which, though M. Latour thinks otherwise, would always have been admitted by the British Government.

STORIES.*

OLYMPIAS, unlike the seven other stories forming the subject of the present article, is not the ordinary shilling story-book so freely offered to passengers by railway. It is, indeed, a tale in one volume, but it is bound in cloth, and looks as if it cost half-a-crown. It is classical, melancholy, and pretentious. It deals with Greeks of the twelfth century, with Athens and Constantinople, with conspirators and Anna Comnena. The hero is a sort of inferior Tito Melema, named Theodore:—

His one aim was pleasure. He seemed endowed with no conscience, no heart, no mind. His soul was apparently but a blank, glittering surface, like a polished steel mirror, which reflected everything near it brightly, vividly, keenly, and then faded away as if it had never been.

It may be our bad luck, or it may be that mirrors are now more usually made of glass than of steel, but we have never met with a mirror which was in the habit of fading away as if it had never been, and cannot but think that any mirror would want a great deal of polishing to make it do so. But that is by the way. The mindless Theodore and his vanishing soul were captured by brigands, who were also secret conspirators; and he accordingly became a conspirator and the affianced lover of a guileless maiden, called Zoe. He subsequently went to Constantinople in the company of Olympias, who was a strong-minded woman, and, therefore, fell in love with him. By the commands of her father, a wily and ambitious statesman, he dressed himself up as St. Michael, and in that character frightened the Emperor Alexius to death, anticipating by at least a week what would otherwise have been the natural period of that potentate's earthly career. Anna Comnena, the Emperor's daughter, had made a plot to kill her brother John, and reign in his stead, but it came to nothing, though it was supported by her mother, whose character was such that, when she was "left alone, the placid, unmeaning countenance of the Empress Irene altered. Her face changed into an expression of intense craft and suspicion." The end of it all was that Theodore made up what ought to have been his mind, that he did not care much for Olympias—and small blame to him—and went back to Zoe, when he got into trouble with the conspirators for having murdered only one emperor, and was condemned to drain the poisoned cup. As soon as sentence was passed—the accused not appearing—Zoe set off in a boat to warn him. She was so foolish as to stand up in the stern of the boat (a most injudicious practice—we have known a college coxswain miss making his bump at Ditton, and get bumped himself above the railway-bridge, solely because his feelings were too many for him, and caused him to stand up and nearly capsize his boat at the former crisis), holding a torch, whereupon a storm arose, and she fell out, and was drowned, and "while the breezes chanted a mournful dirge round the maiden's body, their sister-winds stopped their mad carols, and died away in weird sighs." So her corpse floated past a place where Theodore was, and floated face upwards, with its head out of the water, like the one in the popular engraving. This infraction of the order of nature, complicated with "the recoil from his own baseness, broke in twain the slender thread of reason that remained." In other words, he became a drivelling idiot, and "two years later" expired on Zoe's grave.

Randall Mackaye is the person whom Miss Walworth, the author of his being, describes as a Splendid Egotist. There is nothing splendid about him, certainly not his egotism, which was nothing more than ordinary ill-temper, idleness, and self-indulgence. He had an uncomfortable, earnest, and disagreeable wife called Marianne, who ran away and hid herself, that she might not "hamper" him in his artistic endeavours. (She once suggested that she should remain "inconnu.") Randall then flirted terribly with a rich and rather pleasant young lady—she had no manners, but Miss Walworth is responsible for that—called Jeanne Lenox. The upshot was that she found out he was married, and cried bitterly; that he completed a statue of his wife, and nearly died of an illness; that his wife, who had meanwhile fallen in love with a doctor, nursed him through it; that they were reconciled, that afterwards he died of something else, and that Marianne and Jeanne married the doctor and a miscellaneous young man respectively. Now all these people were Americans.

If one was obliged to read a shilling story-book, The Veiled Picture would be rather a good one for the purpose. The story is nothing out of the way, and the characters are nought; but the picture and the game it had with various people who looked at it incautiously are really rather weird. It was a picture of an old man of villanous aspect, holding a curtain aside and looking out from behind it. This old man had once been alive, and was, in fact, the artist, and he had concluded a disreputable career in a most disagreeable manner. Also, there was reason to believe that he had been a wizard. And the picture behaved accordingly. All this is rather pleasing. The tale is not improved by a weak plot of domestic poisoning, which has been done about two thousand times before, was frustrated before it had time to get thrilling, and has only the vaguest connexion with the veiled picture.

It is a feeble device to give a story such a ridiculous title as Andrewlina, and to justify it by introducing a female who was so called because her name was Andrewseline, and so named because her father's name was Andrew, and shortly before her birth her illiterate mother had perused with pleasure a tale in which one of the personages was a Lady Selina. The bones of the story are on this wise. Martin Aylmer was a commercial gentleman about to become insolvent. To him entered unexpectedly his nephew, Leonard Aylmer, who had found a cellar full of gold ingots in America, and consequently had 20,000*l.* in banknotes in his pocket. Leonard, as soon as he had explained this, fell down an empty hoist into a cellar. Martin went down, and found him apparently dead. What then followed, and the deeds of Simon Murgatroyd, the confidential clerk, and his crimes that he did, shall remain hidden. But all this time Leonard was engaged to Martin's daughter Rose—as if Rose Aylmer was a name new in polite literature. Murgatroyd designed to marry Rose and live on the 20,000*l.* “Which,” as the poet says, “he would have done” if he had not died by the act of God, just when a person appropriately named Cadd, co-owner with Leonard of the ingots, had found Leonard and unravelled the mystery of Martin's death. But why Andrewlina? Well, because Mr. J. S. Fletcher “had a higher aim in writing it than merely to amuse,” and that was to teach us that the most desperate villain may have done one thoroughly good deed, and the person benefited may be grateful. Murgatroyd's good deed was having been kind to Andrewlina, who was a misshapen and surprisingly hideous female, with eyes of different colours. She manifested her gratitude by dying on his corpse; but he knew nothing about that, and the only practical result (to him) of her affection was that she inadvertently set Cadd on his trail, whereby he would probably have been caught, torn from the arms of the reluctant Rose Aylmer, and hanged, if it had not been for his accidental death. The moral seems doubtful, and has certainly very little to do with the plot. Mr. J. S. Fletcher believes that “there is no extradition treaty between Spain and England.” Mr. Labouchere could tell him that there is.

The Devil's Whisper is a story about a murder, and a heroic writer of leading articles for a provincial newspaper, who rode a bicycle, but got no one to marry him. However, he was not the unjustly suspected party. The story is neither better nor worse than most of the many others annually published on the same cheerful theme. We are sorry to say that the author has recourse to the same contemptible device which we had occasion to reprobate a few weeks ago. The murder turns out to have been committed by the village idiot, in an access of unreasoning fury, and the fact becomes apparent to the reader painfully soon, with the necessary result of robbing the story of any little interest it might otherwise have possessed. Mr. Barnett and his newspaper man betray so violent and unaccountable a hatred of policemen as to suggest that one or the other must at some time have suffered at their hands.

We are sorry to observe a tendency in this class of British fiction to introduce sexual immorality as an important element of interest. No one of the three paper volumes remaining to be criticized is quite free from this blemish. It is made worse—or better—by the fact that the writers who suffer from it are not capable of giving to their improprieties the attraction which vice has when skilfully handled. They are still a long way behind their French models in the openness with which they treat of subjects better not written about, and best not thought about, and they are even further behind them in the meretricious allurements in the devising of which some of our neighbours have attained no inconsiderable degree of skill. It is only very slightly that the foregoing general observations apply to Mr. B. L. Farjeon's The Blood White Rose. Nevertheless, the work is poor enough to be quite unworthy of that prolific writer's modest fame. A very silly young man kept a very silly little mistress in a cottage in Surrey, and for financial reasons proposed to marry a young woman who cherished the wild delusion that he would be able to introduce her into rather good society. The mistress was fond of white roses, which the silly young man frequently gave to her. So when she heard that she was to be deserted she broke a blood-vessel over one, and her lover wore the gory vegetable “in a locket on his watch-chain” for ever more. An escaped convict got mixed up in their affairs, rescued the youth from his marriage of convenience, and enabled him to marry the owner of the blood-vessel, who, by dint of becoming a comparatively honest woman, developed into “one of the sweetest and noblest women by which a man's life was ever blessed.”

The eponymous heroine of Grisette cannot be called a good or even a respectable woman. She passed her life partly at Paris and partly at New York, and died of heart disease during a rough-and-tumble between two of her admirers. She did nothing strikingly profligate, but contrived to be always excessively depressing. “Lew Rosen's” style is curious. It suggests bad French, baldly translated into indifferent American.

The Princess Daphne is also not cheerful. It is mixed up with mesmerism, the heroine, whose name is Daphne, becoming the involuntary victim of a distant relation of her own in America. Their common ancestor was a negro, or partly so, and the author is under the common delusion that this entitles him to call them Creoles. In fact, a Creole is a person of pure European blood born in the West or East Indies. Every one numbers plenty of them among the whitest of his acquaintances. This Daphne moved in a disreputable circle of painters and others calling themselves “Bohemians,” and living in and about Kensington in the year 1877, and, oddly enough, conversing almost exclusively in slang expressions never heard of until several years later. She was a person of artistic talent, high-souled conversation, and thoroughly dissolute conduct. Her excuse was that she was becoming by degrees inflated by most of the soul of her mesmerizer; but she was living with a man she might perfectly well have married before she began to be mesmerized. At last the mesmerizer died, and she absorbed all that remained of his soul; whereupon her character changed, and she became miscellaneous in her affections and more frankly degraded than before. She made friends with the mistress of the defunct, and was eventually murdered by her. All the mesmerism in the world would not save the story from being peculiarly sordid and discreditable.

HENRY RICHARD, M.P.*

THE impression with which we opened this volume is that with which we close it—that Mr. Henry Richard was a worthy and well-intentioned man; but whether it was worth while going through so much—nearly four hundred pages—in order, as the schoolboy said, to learn so little, is a subject on which we have a rather injured and resentful opinion. The image of Mr. Richard might well have been allowed to survive only in the memory of his friends and associates until it faded away in that quiet euthanasia which is perhaps most to be desired alike for the living and the dead. The solemnity of interment in this somewhat funereal volume which Mr. Charles S. Miall has compiled, and in which he reads a sort of burial service over his friend, might have been spared. That no-biography and the lot of the weary to which Carlyle, unconscious of the mocking fates, aspired, might appropriately have been vouchsafed to Mr. Richard. There was really no occasion to write his life. It consisted in his public work as Secretary of the Peace Society, and as a Welsh Nonconformist member of Parliament, and there was nothing sufficiently memorable in it to justify its disentanglement from the web of events and the crowd of persons into which it was woven. If there had been any attempt at portraiture of character the volume might have possessed some interest; but Mr. Charles S. Miall does not essay any portrait of his friend, and offers us only the photograph by Messrs. Elliot & Fry which fronts the title-page. If there had been any sketch of the rather curious society in which the greater part of Mr. Richard's life was spent—the aboriginal Welsh shopkeepers and Nonconformists among whom his boyhood was passed, and the humanitarian enthusiasts of the middle part of his career—light might have been thrown on some eccentricities of English life. But Mr. Miall has apparently lived so much among these things and people as to be unaware of the necessity of interpreting them to the rest of mankind. The work is a record of public meetings and interviews, of Congresses and deputations, of Committees and organizations, which, however important at the moment and in the eyes of those who had to do with them, scarcely justified disinterment from the columns of the Herald of Peace. Copious extracts are, indeed, given from Mr. Richard's diaries—descriptions of the European capitals which he visited as “the Apostle of Peace,” and of the sovereigns, statesmen, and other notable persons whom he saw, and who too often beheld in him, it is to be feared, an unconscious agent of their own not always peaceful designs. But Mr. Richard was too much absorbed in his mission to have a very quick eye for persons and places in any other relation than that of friends or opponents of the cause in which he was swallowed up. M. Renan describes, in a picturesque passage, the evangelic indifference of the first Christian missionaries to the glories of the historic scenes which they visited. The Jewish Ghetto of Athens or Rome was more to them than the Parthenon or the Capitol. So to Mr. Richard, though he occasionally pumps up a little enthusiasm, sometimes odd enough for one of his puritanic training and rigid doctrine, as when at Weimar his heart beat quicker at the thoughts of Goethe and Schiller and Wieland and Herder, the small circle of peace enthusiasts was nearly everything, and history, art, and architecture were next to nothing. In the Madeleine he saw only “a splendid theatrical exhibition,” and of Berlin he has little to say but that it “bears the hard iron impress of that bad man called Frederick the Great.” Not that he does not attempt records—interesting enough to the friends for whom they were first written, and who were anxious to know what he was about—of the things he did, the persons and places he saw, and the reflections which occurred to his mind. They are, for the most part, such as a personally-conducted Cook's tourist might write home to be read in the back parlour after shop hours.

Henry Richard, who was born in Cardiganshire in 1812, was the son of the Reverend (and, we are assured, eminent) Ebenezer Richard, a Calvinistic Methodist minister at Tregaron, who, as Sir William Harcourt and Mr. Osborne Morgan will hear with a thrill of satisfaction, resisted persistent attempts to induce him to accept episcopal ordination. Henry served a creditable apprenticeship of three years to a linendraper at Carmarthen. He was then seized with the ordinary Dissenting youth's ambition to enter the ministry, and, there being no academy of his own sect in Wales, was sent to Highbury (Congregational) College, near London. In 1835 he was appointed to the charge of the Marlborough Chapel in the Old Kent Road. He appears to have been successful as pastor and preacher; but from the first he was somewhat of a missionary from Wales to England; and he contributed to the pacification of the Rebecca rioters, and took a part, as an extreme voluntarist, in the discussions on Welsh education and character to which Lord John Russell's Minutes in Council gave rise. He was always more a man of action and of organization than of thought, and he probably found the work which he was best fitted to do when in 1848 he was appointed Secretary to the Society for the Promotion of Permanent and Universal Peace. The name of the Society has the effect of satire when it is thought of in connexion with the events of European and American history during the past forty years. The vision of universal and permanent peace has indeed engaged higher minds than that of Mr. Richard from the Pax Romana of the Cæsars to the peace of which Henri Quatre and Sully dreamed. But that was a peace to be imposed by statesmanship and organized force upon subject nations. To Mr. Richard, Europe and the world were a sort of gigantic Dissenting meeting-house, to be governed by Congregationalist and Baptist deacons. He fancied that the flames of war could be extinguished by a few oily words scattered here and there. Mr. Henry Richard probably never heard of the Bourgeois Gentilhomme, or he might have seen the parody of his own doctrine and method in that of M. Jourdain's music-master:—"Si tous les hommes apprenaient la musique, ne serait-ce pas le moyen de s'accorder ensemble et de voir dans le monde la paix universelle?" Mr. Henry Richard believed that he possessed the secret of this music. If anything could have awakened him from the dream in which he passed his life, the events, as we have ventured to hint, of the forty years which followed his acceptance of the office of the Secretaryship of the Society for the Promotion of Universal and Permanent Peace would have done so. The nations beat their ploughshares into swords, and seemed resolved to learn peace no more. The Crimean War was followed by the war of France and Italy against Austria, of Austria and Prussia against Denmark, of Prussia against Austria, of Germany against France, of Russia against Turkey, the war of England in Egypt, and in America by the fratricidal conflict of the Northern and Southern States. Still the Herald of Peace went on its way, and Peace Congresses met at Brussels and Paris and Frankfurt. We hesitate to say that the well-intentioned exertions of Mr. Richard and his friends were directly contributory to these incessant wars. But, as idle feeling is usually, on the principle worked out by Bishop Butler, followed by contradictory practice, we cannot put this possibility altogether aside. The humanitarianism of Robespierre was the germ out of which the cruelties of the Reign of Terror sprang, and a maudlin philanthropy is apt to convert itself into fierce antipathies. The feelings which spend themselves in talk leave space for action to their opposites.

In 1868 Mr. Henry Richard was elected member of Parliament for Merthyr Tydfil, and continued to represent that borough till his death, twenty years afterwards. We need not follow his career. It was that of the Dissenting Radical follower, and occasionally leader, of Mr. Gladstone. Probably Mr. Richard was more successful in the House of Commons than any member who has passed into it from the Dissenting pulpit. There was no trace of Stiggins or Chadband in his tone. He never mounted the tub. He was superior as regards his faculty of recommending himself to the House of Commons to his two most notable predecessors among Nonconformist preachers. His direct and simple speech was more impressive than the artificial rhetoric of the late Mr. W. J. Fox—a man intellectually much his superior; and he was free from the whining, writhing, Sunday-school teacher tones and gestures of the late Mr. Edward Miall, who seemed bent on showing the world how like to Uriah Heep affectation may make a very worthy man. In private Mr. Richard appears to have been genial and amiable, and to have exhibited a more abundant common sense than might have been looked for in a man of many fads and one idea.

WHATEVER may be thought of Mr. Bain's book, there is on one point no possibility of a difference of opinion. It is another example of what we consider the happy reversion to the older style of biography, in which the biographer was, if not an indiscriminate panegyrist, at any rate not a devil's advocate. To take a dead stranger in for the sake of blackening his character has always seemed to us nearly as great a breach of hospitality and decency as to take a live one in for the sake of blackening his eyes. It is true that the more liberal hospitaller is apt to err on the other side, and we think we shall have to show that Mr. Bain does this; but the fault is trifling and pardonable in comparison with the slow and deliberate treachery—the petty treason almost technically—of the other class.

In England, at least, we should say that Gustavus Adolphus's daughter is rather too little known than too harshly judged by the general. Everybody of fair information has heard something of her dealings with Whitelocke, of the abdication, of the ugly and mysterious Monaldeschi business; not many people, perhaps, could say much else about Christina. Mr. Bain has been unable to find any "competent and trustworthy" English account of her, except one by Mr. Woodhead, some quarter of a century old, and we cannot supplement his discoveries. His own book is very well entitled, within its limits, to the praise of completeness, all the main and most of the minor facts being duly recorded and intelligently woven together. It is also, as far as these facts go, quite trustworthy; and, for our part, we are never weary of repeating that, so long as a historian's and biographer's facts are trustworthy, and provided that he takes pains to marshal his arguments intelligibly, we care little about any difference with his conclusions. Mr. Bain, then, sets out truly and forcibly the good side of Christina's acts and deeds; while, sworn champion of hers as he is, he admits with frankness, and almost naïveté, that it would have been much more convenient of her if she would have been kind enough to die soon after her abdication, instead of spending five-ninths of her life (the arithmetic is ours) and a period three and a half times as long as her reign in the hopelessly anomalous condition of an abdicated sovereign who still kept up a claim not merely to the honours, but to some of the positive rights, of sovereignty. He exposes the awkward position, glorious as it was after a fashion, of Sweden at Gustavus's death, glorifies and perhaps does not exaggerate Christina's personal endeavour to bring about the Peace of Westphalia, and dwells much on the efforts she made to improve the condition of the lower Estates in her kingdom. At the same time he does not attempt to excuse the singular and fatal extravagance of her financial management, and the way in which, though she perfectly well knew that the alienation of the crown domains to the nobles was the main reason of the popular discontent, and of its causes, she gave away, mortgaged, and sold the lands which were the main, if not the sole, source of a Swedish monarch's revenue. And if he credits her with Liberal ideas, he admits that those ideas did not remove the wretched condition of the country during her reign; and that her "encouragement of learning" amounted more to the salaried at the cost of the country of a bevy of by no means always well selected foreign savants, who were mere exotics, and in no kind of way affected for good indigenous science, art, or literature.

The truth is, however, and Mr. Bain is well aware of it, that, though Christina would, of course, not have been half or a hundredth part so interesting if she had not been a queen, it is not in any of her regal acts, except her abdication, that the interest of her lies, and that even there it is much more a personal than a political interest. Why did she do it? What was the reason of her nominally subsequent, but really coincident, or precedent, conversion? What are we to think about the Monaldeschi business? What was Christina's general character as a woman? Was she a sort of précieuse-coquette whose dislike of marriage did not preclude looseness of morals, a flighty évanouie for whom the cares of State were too much, a free-thinking flirt? Was she a serious believer in Roman Catholicism, especially in that part of its additions to the common faith of Christendom which consists in the glorification of celibacy, and does this belief account for the most famous act of her public and for many of the oddities of her private life? Mr. Bain answers this last question unhesitatingly in the affirmative, and most of the others equally in her favour. It may, perhaps, be granted that there is no positive evidence of any moral irregularity on her part, or even of her having felt a passionate affection for any individual of either sex, except (perhaps) her cousin and successor, Prince Charles (whom she afterwards refused to marry), when she was very young, and the beautiful Ebba Sparre, her only female friend. At the same time her conduct in regard to the Frenchman Bourdelot, to Monaldeschi, and others, reached something like the height of imprudence. It is always awkward when a queen shows indiscreet and indiscriminate partiality for foreigners of undistinguished, if not exactly low, birth, and it does not improve the matter when she exhibits an aversion to matrimony. As to the conversion, Mr. Bain is very angry with the "bat-eyed biographers." But we are not so easily able, as he seems to be, to reconcile Christina's almost, if not quite, avowed free-thinking with any sincere devotion to Catholicism as Catholicism. We own that we think Christina considered the Roman form thereof as "the religion for a lady," just as her contemporary considered another creed "not the religion for a gentleman." The argument that she must have felt deeply because she talked lightly, though it will occasionally apply, is rather a dangerous one, as in the following passage:—

The ceremony over, it was celebrated with great rejoicings, bonfires, the firing of cannon, plays, and spectacles: a musical tragi-comedy was performed by the best musicians in Italy. As a specimen of the sort of thing invented about Christina, Chevreau, a fertile source, declares that on this occasion she said to the circle surrounding her, "Tis but right, gentlemen, you should treat me to a comedy, since I have just treated you to a farce." Impudence could go no farther; as if at such a moment she would have trampled on the Catholic proprieties on the point of going to Rome.

Certainly such a story is to be regarded with suspicion. But is it so utterly improbable? How about the appropriateness of the "musical tragi-comedy" (which appears to be admitted) itself to "Catholic proprieties"? And the entry into Rome "as an Amazon"? And the remark (which Mr. Bain accepts and tries to account for) when the Pope sent her a rosary, "I did not become a Catholic to tell beads"?

Over the Monaldeschi business Mr. Bain slides with dexterous, but perhaps too rapid, step. He gives the two well-known relations—that of Père Le Bel and the official one—almost in full, and then argues, as he has a right to do, that Christina, by the Act of Abdication itself, enjoyed sovereign and summary jurisdiction over her household. The question how far this would apply in a foreign country, and especially in the palace of a foreign monarch, is an interesting point of law, or perhaps rather of politics, and both sides of it may be reasonably maintained. But the competence of the Court and the guilt of the prisoner are two very different things, and it is over the latter that Mr. Bain executes glissades. "From these accounts it is easy to see that at any rate the Marquis thoroughly deserved his death; the dastardly traitor was judged out of his own mouth." Is it so easy? We have never ourselves been able to make out exactly what the crime was, much less whether it "deserved death." But Mr. Bain quotes and endorses Leibnitz's remark that "It is not hard to judge that his crime was of a nature to prevent it from being submitted to a third person," and that the Queen "found Monaldeschi deserving of death." If this is a good defence, all we can say is that the most ardent Royalist may boggle at it, and that it simply obliterates almost all distinction between execution and assassination. We have, however, no intention of being hard on Christina, who, partly by her fault, but chiefly by her misfortune, was in that position in which a woman is peculiarly open to the machinations of scoundrels. Mr. Bain's championship of her is too chivalrous not to deserve respect, and vigorous enough to command it. If he had taken his courage in both hands, and admitted directly, as he does in a roundabout and periphrastic kind of way, the undoubted historical fact that there was always latent, and very frequently patent, in the House of Vasa what is called, in plain English, madness, he would have made his own task easier, and would have gone, as we think, much nearer to the truth of things. In Christina, indeed, the madness did not reach the unquestionable point which it reached in Eric XIV. before her and in not a few of the race after her. It stopped even a little short of the pitch it reached in Charles XII., who was, however, in not a few ways a kind of male Christina. But it was, if not what is vulgarly called madness, eccentricity in the highest degree. Her literal "rising up and lying down" (she never took sleep enough for any really sane person, and is well known to have killed Descartes by making him get up at five o'clock on Swedish winter mornings), her oddities of costume, her frantic riding, her extravagance (combined as it was with something almost like frugality), her aversion to marriage, her religious proceedings, were all the conduct of what is familiarly called a "cracked" person. The too famous Monaldeschi business and the return to Sweden followed suit. If Christina had been bad as well as mad, she would have had Monaldeschi poniarded comfortably in some out-of-the-way place, and no one would have made any fuss about it. If she had not been mad at all, she would have boxed his ears or had him bastinadoed, and so an end. But she was not a sane person, and no apology will make her one. At the same time she was very clever and very interesting, and Mr. Bain has written a study of her which possesses the same good qualities. We shall be glad to see more historical work from his hand.

WATTS'S DICTIONARY OF CHEMISTRY.*

THE first volume of this book appeared only last year, and, considering the mass of work involved, the editors deserve the highest praise for their industry. The value of every scientific work, but particularly of a dictionary, is greatly diminished when the volumes follow one another slowly. It often happens, indeed, that the initial letter determines whether the information conveyed to us is or is not out of date. Advance in all branches of science is rapid; but in chemistry it is gigantic, and the most diligent student finds it hard to avoid being swamped by the torrent of new discovery which constantly pours from all civilized countries. The Chemical Society of London issues monthly a series of abstracts of new researches. These abstracts, prepared with great skill and care, and at no small expense, form a portentous volume at the end of the year, and, taking at random a single number of the Journal, that for October of the present year, we find no less than one hundred and ninety notices, each representing a separate discovery. A large proportion of these discoveries are in regard to individual facts or groups of facts. We find scores upon scores of new compounds described, studied, and named, often in the more than sesquipedalian manner which, while apparently an addition to the difficulties of the science, is in reality a welcome aid, and of the greatest possible importance to it. It is true that the name phenylmethylbenzylhydroxypyrimidine does not attract the light reader; but to the advanced student who is already familiar with all, or nearly all, its syllables, it tells the nature and composition of the substance and the sources from which it is obtained. The fact is, that the chemistry of the present, and even as far as we can anticipate of the future, is not and cannot become a mere assemblage of facts. Chemistry would already be an impossible study if that were the case. But general laws and the classification which grows from them keep pace fairly well with the facts, and in countless cases precede them. Even where the law is dim, the artful hypothesis, often surrendered with the progress of knowledge, but as often leading the way to settled law, is a constant help.

An inspection of the volume before us illustrates in various ways the composite character of chemical progress. We may say at once that the book is admirably edited and presents a carefully-condensed, but very full, account of scientific knowledge in regard to the matter treated of. The new edition will be valuable for many years as marking the state of chemistry at the date of each volume.

The present volume consists of a good many long and a great number of short articles. Chemical physics and theoretical chemistry are well represented under such headings as Crystallization, Densities, Dissociation (a most valuable essay by Professor Threlfall, of Sydney, N.S.W.), Classification, and Equivalency; while the remaining and greater part of the space is devoted to matters of fact. It is unnecessary and would be inconvenient to abandon a time-honoured distinction, even though the old line of separation has disappeared, and the descriptive articles may therefore be divided into those on inorganic and on organic chemistry.

The principal contributors are the editors; Mr. Pattison Muir taking the inorganic and general, and Dr. Forster Morley the organic, portions. As examples of Mr. Muir's best work may be cited the articles headed Classification, Cyanides, and Hydrogen, besides many on the metals, particularly chromium, cobalt, copper, and gold. The account of hydrogen is very full and clear, and represents fairly the care with which the editors have done their work. Here, as elsewhere, condensation is carried to the uttermost, and abbreviations are used to such an extent, that a little practice is required before the text becomes intelligible. We cordially approve of this condensation, for the book is a dictionary, and not a treatise, and is, moreover, intended exclusively for experts and advanced students. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that in the prescribed and convenient limits of the book one-half of the matter must have been excluded if a more diffuse style had been adopted. The abbreviations are, of course, a trouble, but this trouble is reduced to a minimum by the ingenious contrivance of a card book-marker, on which the abbreviations employed are printed. The effect of the condensation on the mass of included matter is well shown in the article on Hydrogen, to which reference has already been made. The physical constants—that is, the numbers representing the density, elasticity, solubility, specific heat, and suchlike peculiarities of the more important forms of matter—are given most imperfectly and are often omitted altogether in ordinary treatises on chemistry. Yet they are often the very facts we want to know when we refer to the pages of an advanced work. Generalities can be found in every text-book, and are commonly well known to the chemist who consults a large dictionary. What he wants is numbers—details. Now under the heading Hydrogen we find in the first twenty-nine lines an elaborate statement of most of these constants, including Lord Rayleigh's recent determination of its density in relation to oxygen, its density in the liquid state, its heat of combustion with and without condensation of water, and the chief lines in its emission spectrum. The rest of the article is equally valuable and almost equally condensed.

The work of Dr. Morley has been not less laborious, and is on a fair level with that of Mr. Muir. His articles are for the most part short, because he has wisely broken up the vast mass with which he had to deal under the greatest possible number of separate headings. It would be useless to attempt to convey any idea of the character or merit of these articles either by description or quotation. Their multiplicity and their accuracy are the only features to note in regard to them. Taking one example, almost at random, we may select Glycerin. Here, in nine closely-printed double-column pages, we find in the usual condensed form an account of the history, the modes of separation, the physical and chemical properties, the methods of detection and estimation, the reactions (in thirty-three paragraphs), and the numerous, and in some cases very important, derivatives of the compound, among which the tri-nitrate, commonly called nitroglycerin, takes an honoured place. Certainly glycerin cannot complain of neglect.

No one who reads the list which precedes the text of the volume will deny that the editors have been "assisted by eminent contributors." These outside contributors number eighteen in all. Every one is competent, and many are eminent in their several departments. One lady, Miss Ida Freund, Lecturer on Chemistry in Newnham College, Cambridge, appears in the list. She supplies the article on "Densities, Relative," which is well written, and includes descriptions, perhaps sufficient, of the chief methods for the determination of the densities of vapours. It might, perhaps, have been well to have included some notice of the very delicate apparatus of Sprengel for finding the specific gravities of liquids. Space prevents us from discussing the merits of the other special articles. It is needless to tell chemists that Mr. David Howard writes with authority on Cinchona Bark, Dr. Halliburton on Hæmoglobin, Mr. O'Sullivan on Dextrin, Professor Thorpe on Combustion and Flame, and Professor Japp on certain important organic groups; and it must be understood that we do not undervalue other contributions because we cannot notice them.

It would, of course, be easy to point out what, in commercial language, are called errors and omissions in the book before us. No human skill could avoid them altogether in a Dictionary of such magnitude and difficulty. Criticism on minor points would be unfair, and we prefer to record our satisfaction that one of the greatest of English scientific works is in process of republication, and that the utmost possible skill, care, and industry are at work in the enterprise.

CARLO GOZZI.*

INTO that gallery of eighteenth-century celebrities which includes, perhaps, the most lifelike and recognizable portraits of past worthies, a new and an eminently attractive portrait is, for the first time so far as the English public is concerned, introduced. Neglected in his own country, and misrepresented elsewhere, Carlo Gozzi, to all but the closest students of Italian literature, is a name and no more. While his memoirs and his fables are unmentioned in accepted bibliographies, biographical dictionaries supply a few meagre particulars concerning his life at the close of that of his more distinguished brother Gasparo, whose works figure in the collections of Italian classics and are duly quoted in sale catalogues. If only on account of their rarity, however, since Mr. Symonds had to wait for months for a complete copy for the purpose of translation, the Memoirs, of which one edition only has appeared, deserve the attention of the bibliographer, and the works, though forgotten by Gozzi's own countrymen, exercised in their day a potent, if in a sense reactionary, influence over the Italian stage. Puck, or some equally mischievous deity, seems to have presided over the destinies of Gozzi, and the attempts in Germany and France to depict the Italian dramatist as a precursor of romanticism have only thickened the fog in the midst of which Gozzi is compelled to dwell.

When now Gozzi comes before us it is with an eminently distinct, pleasing, and fascinating individuality. A gentleman and a respecter of authority in a period of wild upheaval, a man of dignified life in a time of unbridled sensuality, he puts in strong claims upon respect, and all but forces us to hold him up as a pattern of morality. He would, however, himself have been the first to laugh at the ascription to him of such serious character. In this respect he follows at a distance Rabelais, who, while he compels admiration and worship, is himself the first apparently to deride the effort to treat him too gravely. It is as a vivacious, dogmatic, controversial, and polished old cynic and misogynist that Gozzi most directly appeals to us. Saved by constitution and temperament from current excesses, he is anxious it should be known that, though temperate himself, he does not sit in judgment upon others, and gives himself no airs of austerity. He is, on the contrary, at the trouble to depict with some vivacity the few amorous adventures of his adolescence which convinced him of the perfidy of the fair sex, and took from him the desire for further enterprise. When, in later life, he speaks of his relations with a married actress, they are such as in those days involved no necessary scandal, and it is possible to hold, though Mr. Symonds scarcely accepts the idea, that they were absolutely innocent. Over the scapegrace adventures Mr. Symonds glides lightly. Gozzi is, as he says, no classic, and the kind of strict fidelity demanded in a translation of Benvenuto Cellini is in his case not imperative. In a few cases, accordingly, and especially in dealing with these chapters, Mr. Symonds abridges, condenses, or summarizes. No word, he declares, that Gozzi has written is "unworthy of a man of principle." Nothing is there in the work "which is calculated to make vice alluring." The candour of the passages descriptive of juvenile experiences is that "of a cleanly heart resolved to bare its secret by an effort of self-portraiture," and influenced, it may be supposed, in such revelations by the interest and pardon that had waited upon the far more outspoken confidences of a series of autobiographers between Rousseau and Restif de la Bretonne. As regards Teodora Ricci, meanwhile, to whom Gozzi dedicates some very long chapters, which the translator abridges, the statement of Gozzi, if not quite convincing, is plain. After giving a lifelike and not wholly attractive picture of the woman, of her accession to the theatrical company of Sacchi, for which he wrote, and of the jealousies and scandals which his interest in her awoke, he declares that he told her, in offering to stand by her:—

For myself, I meant to be her avowed friend, her daily visitor, and cavalier in public; but she must not think that I wanted to play the part of a lover, far less of a flatterer. My age, which bordered upon fifty, and my temperament were enough to prevent me from making any foolish pretensions to her favours.

Such relationships were not unknown nor blamed in Italian society, and the payment of constant attentions to a married woman was not necessarily compromising. Further into this question it is needless to enter. The subject has, however, interest in regard to the character of Gozzi, whose opinions concerning women, and especially actresses, are elsewhere avowed with cynical frankness:—

The net result of my observations upon women is this. The love which most of them pretend for men, springs mainly from their vanity or interest. They wish to be surrounded by admirers. They are ambitious to captivate the hearts and heads of people of importance, in order to reign as petty queens, to take the lead, to exercise power, to levy contributions. Or else they ensnare slaves devoted to them, free-handed managers of theatres, men who will give them the means at balls, at petits soupers, at country houses, at great entertainments, to eclipse their rivals, to acquire new lovers, and to betray their faithful servant, their credulous accomplice in this game of fashion.

Curiously characteristic of the man are his appearances in the world of letters. He is stimulated into authorship by his antagonism. His fiabe teatrali were written as a protest against what he calls the "Goldonio-Chiaristic epidemic," the favour extended, in the closet and on the stage, to the comedies of Goldoni and of his flatulent rival Chiari. His Memoirs, moreover, the very title of which is indicative of the man—Memorie inutili della vita di Carlo Gozzi, scritte da lui medesimo e pubblicate per umiltà—did not see the light until the year 1797, when the author, then seventy-seven years of age, had long disappeared from the ken of his countrymen. They were written much earlier, however, and were the outcome of a feud with Pier' Antonio Gratarol, which stands as a curiosity among the quarrels of authors. Taking its rise in the impertinence of some actors and the malignity of an offended woman, this dispute—for the particulars of which the reader must turn to Mr. Symonds's pleasant volumes—led to the downfall and ruin of Gratarol, who, after his appointment as resident Minister at Naples, quitted Venice, the Government of which principality, little disposed to leniency or dealing with recalcitrant citizens, confiscated his property and put a price upon his head. Gozzi's Memoirs, intended as an explanation, were practically finished in 1780. The same high-handed authority forbade, however, their publication; and Gozzi, a thorough Venetian, whose travels do not appear, except during three years of military service in Dalmatia, to have extended beyond the limits of the Republic, with the fear of the piombi before his eyes, threw the MSS. aside until the French Revolution brought with it the fall of the Government.

Attempts to vindicate Italian literature from the corrupting influences of the eighteenth century began in epigrams, satires, and dissertations, issued from the burlesque society of the Accademia Granellesca. In 1756, or the following year, Gozzi published La Tartana degl' influssi per l' anno bisestile, a satire which elicited from Goldoni a not too polite rejoinder. For four years the combat went on with wavering fortunes, for Goldoni, whom at bottom Gozzi respected, was not a contemptible antagonist. More and more earnest in defence of the Italian Commedia dell' arte, which his opponents were replacing by regular comedy, Gozzi, in answer to a challenge from his principal antagonist to do something which should fill a public theatre with enthusiastic audiences, offered to distance his competitors by putting on the boards the old fairy story of the "Loves of the Three Oranges." In answer to the shouts of laughter which the boast elicited, Gozzi was as good as his word, and at the end of January 1761 the Amore delle Tre Melarancie was produced by Sacchi, a well-known manager.

This was the first of a long series of theatrical fables by which the Venetian public was carried away, which brought Gozzi high reputation, while gratifying his delight in mischief as well as his aristocratic and conservative instincts, and might have brought him fortune had he not somewhat magnificently scorned to take money for his labours. The most interesting fact in connexion with them, however, was the revival of interest in the Commedia dell' arte, which before the appearance of Gozzi had languished and all but expired. The Commedia dell' arte, the history of which Mr. Symonds writes, putting together very lucidly and effectively all that is known concerning its descent from Atellan sources and its development in the various provinces of Italy, consists, of course, of the impromptu performances of which the Italians have enjoyed a virtual monopoly. Knowing thoroughly well his actors as well as his subject, Gozzi was able, besides supplying the framework or plot—as Mr. Symonds, adopting an old English word, likes to call it—to suggest to the exponents of the various types of Italian comedy the traits and the lazzi which would be most effective on the stage. A temporary restoration to its old influence of this moribund form of comedy was the result. This, however, was but the "lightning before death," and with the retirement of Gozzi the Commedia dell' arte disappeared.

In the two noble volumes now issued Mr. Symonds has given a picturesque, vigorous, and effective rendering of the Memoirs, with analyses of certain of the fables. He has added essays upon the Commedia dell' arte, upon the quarrel between Gozzi and Gratarol, and upon Pietro Longhi, the Italian painter, who casts a bright light upon the Venice of Casanova, Goldoni, and Gozzi. In these essays the principal charm of a scholarly and delightful book will be found. A double series of illustrations grace the volumes. The first consists of etchings by M. Lalauze, possessing all the elegance and distinction of that distinguished artist; the second of beautifully coloured illustrations of the characters of Italian comedy. In the Histoire du Théâtre Italien of Louis Riccoboni several pictures of Scaramuccia, Arlequino, and other comic Italian characters are supplied. A full series, designed by Maurice Sand and engraved by A. Manceau, adorns M. Sand's Masques et Bouffons, a valuable work indispensable to the lover of the drama. From the last-named source the illustrations to the new work are taken. The best-known characters have been reproduced and brilliantly and attractively coloured by hand. In all literary, artistic, and bibliographic respects the new work is a credit to the English press.

SONGS OF THE WEST.*

INCIDENTALLY, and before the event, Mr. Baring-Gould appears as a contributor to the controversy on Music-Hall music in his prefatory remarks on the very curious and interesting collection of Songs and Ballads of the West of England, which he has quite recently practically illustrated to congenial audiences by a series of concert lectures in Devonshire. He says there is little chance of any revival of popularity for these charming old airs and national songs:—"The present generation will have nothing to say to these songs, especially such as are in minor keys, and supplant them with the vulgarest Music-Hall performances." There is some truth in this view. Perhaps, however, the present generation errs to some extent through ignorance, and cannot be said to supplant that of which it knows nothing by something inferior of which it probably has too much. We are confident there must be many who will have a good deal to say of Songs of the West, and that popular concert programmes will before long include many specimens. They may yet be heard, under the blessing of County Councils, at the Music-Halls, though we cannot say we are enthusiastic concerning the results. No one who has heard Mr. Baring-Gould lecture, or has heard so gifted and admirable a singer as Mrs. Mason interpret these Devonian songs, can be at all eager for the new supplanting suggested. Neither the humour nor the pathos, the grace nor the poetic fancy, of these Songs of the West can be said to be adapted to the Music-Hall manner. We tremble at the thought of hearing "The Imprisoned Lady," a part-song of the purest period of English music, delivered unaccompanied, as it should be, by a quartet of "serio-comiques" at some hall of varieties. Of the jovial air "Parson Hogg," or that capital and still remembered hunting song, or "Arscott of Tetcott," the delightful "Silly Old Man," or the irresistible "Widdicombe Fair," an acceptable rendering and a popular reception might be expected; but we do not yearn to hear some leonine "star" warble the exquisite "Sweet Nightingale," which Mr. Robert Bell heard sung on the Moselle years ago by a party of Cornish miners, or the quaint and thrilling melody of "My Lady's Couch," or the still more lovely song, "My Garden grew plenty of Thyme." The prospect of these refinements is, we confess, far from alluring.

In his preface Mr. Baring-Gould relates how he made the present collection of airs and ballads of the people, and in his lecture he enlarges more explicitly on the essentially English origin of the melodies. Out of the mouths of the moormen, the agricultural labourers, the yeomen of Devonshire—still plentiful in the county—these songs proceed, cherished as traditions, for the most part, yet still sung on occasion. There can be no doubt, however, that few could long survive the levelling democratic influence of the age, and that the majority are worthy of the enthusiasm and zeal of their collector and preserver. As a boy, Mr. Baring-Gould remembers hearing many of these ballads of last or previous century sung at the solitary taverns in or on the moor, and by diligent inquisition and the help of others of kindred spirit he has rescued from imminent extinction a rich and varied collection of ballads, madrigals, and popular songs. In the company of the Rev. H. Fleetwood Sheppard and Mr. F. Bussell, Dartmoor and its confines were explored by Mr. Baring-Gould, and many a reservoir of old song was successfully tapped. James Parsons, labourer, of Lew Down; John Woodrich, blacksmith, of Wollacot Moor, Thrushleton; various old labourers about South Brent and other parts, supplied some of the most characteristic examples, both words and airs, which are arranged for the pianoforte by Mr. Sheppard with excellent taste and skill. The preservation of these old melodies in a fairly uncorrupted state by illiterate folk is less inexplicable than their origin. Some undoubtedly belong to the sixteenth century. They have all the characteristics of the great madrigal age, though Campion, or Byrd, or Morley may not own them. The various Acts directed against the vagrancy of musicians may have tended, as Mr. Baring-Gould suggests, to localize these songs and to preserve them. Devonshire sent her singing men to Court, and when the last minstrel was forbidden to roam he sang as best he might in the village inns at home. Yet it is certainly remarkable that so beautiful and refined an example as "The Imprisoned Lady" should have been preserved by a labourer in the fields. That music flourished among all classes of the people in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries is, of course, but a partial explanation. But that music of so high a type should have remained more than a mere tradition and have descended to the Dartmoor people is somewhat singular. The people are not now much given to music. The tillers of the soil are anything but disposed to lyrics. The roadside inns are not particularly vocal, and the ploughman sings at his work rather less, in our judgment, than his East-country brother. Yet it is not the yeomen and farmers, but the agricultural labourers, that have stored the greater number of these West-country songs. If it is not easy to trace the origin of the airs, it is clear that many of them have a common origin. For instance, "Green Broom" and "Widdicombe Fair" show a near kindred in the opening bars, and it would be easy to note other points of resemblance. That all bagpipe or harp tunes are not Scotch or Welsh, and that many English ballads and songs have been appropriated by the Scotch, are matters naturally suggested and discussed in connexion with these recovered Devonian songs. Is not the music of "Ye banks and braes" English? and did not the Scotch "lift" English music as well as English cattle?

SPORTING IN THE HIMALAYAS AND A GENIAL TRAVELLER.*

HINDU-KOH, or Hindoo Mountain, is the old name for the Himalayan range, through which General Macintyre journeyed in quest of game of all kinds—furred and feathered, large and small. The General is as keen a sportsman as he is a zealous and enthusiastic soldier, and his beloved Ghoorkhas make as useful and eager hunters as they make indomitable troops in the field:—

The Ghoorkhalis—or Ghoorkhas, as they are called in the service—are wild-looking, sturdy lads, with round, flat faces, small eyes, and hair hanging down to their shoulders. This is what they are in the rough. When they have passed through the hands of the barber, the tailor, and the drill-sergeant, they are turned out, so to speak, smart little gems of soldiers, with a sparkle of unpresuming swagger about them which is quite in keeping with their brave, independent spirit. They are strong and stout-limbed, but, as a rule, short. An idea of their stature may be formed when we say that the average height of the battalion we first joined was somewhere about 5 feet 2 inches. But their hearts are as large as their frames are short and tough. Indeed, their pluck and faithfulness to their salt have now become proverbial.

As a rule, these men are sober enough on duty; but when on a "spree" the amount of liquor their heads can stand is astonishing. But this book naturally deals with their sportsmanlike rather than with their military virtues. The General has a ready and affectionate sympathy with them in both capacities. He is by no means a mere slaughterer of game, though he is indefatigable in pursuit of his quarry, and not over-nice as to its quality. Kiang, peacocks, otters, boars, bears, tigers, goats, wild sheep, and musk deer are among the victims of his gun; but he behaves to them all as Izaak Walton counsels the angler to treat his worm.

To the true lover of sport [he says] who is also an ardent admirer of nature as well the mere slaying of his game is certainly not what conduces to his delight in his work. For my own part, a feeling of regret has always been mingled with my exultation at seeing a beautiful animal I have brought down lying lifeless before me, however inconsistent it may seem. Nevertheless, it is very satisfactory to make a good bag, made up, if possible, of varied specimens, and not made up, merely for the sake of competition, of inferior animals, such as a man of true sporting instincts would feel ashamed to shoot at, unless he required meat for his camp.

Many of our readers will remember an almost parallel passage in the journal of the brave and tender-hearted Sir Walter Scott, when he saw the blackcock which he had wounded, but not killed outright, lying at his feet and gazing up at him with his soft, pathetic eye. Among the hardships and pests of a Himalayan hunter must be reckoned the leeches which abound in some of the hills. "These little wretches will penetrate one's feet and ankles through almost anything. On taking off tightly-laced boots after a walk, even along beaten paths, I generally found that one or two had managed to reach my skin." Of the musk-deer and its precious bag of scent the General gives a most telling description. Of the risks of tiger-shooting he reckons the behaviour of the sportsman's friendly ally, the elephant, as one of the worst. Sometimes the brutes will run away, smashing up the guns and the howdahs. Sometimes they will kill the men they carry. Sometimes they get timid, and their huge bodies quake dangerously. One would have thought that with their pachydermatous hides the great trumpeters could afford to laugh at bee-stings. Not so, however. The busy insects will drive them mad with pain and anger, till the castled monsters shriek in agony, and rush off tail on end into the jungle. There is a capital story told by a Munchausen-like hunter of the miraculous craftiness of a boar from whom he had taken refuge in a tree. The beast butted the tree on both sides till it was hollowed and had to fall, and the discomfited sportsman, unperceived by the wily hog, had to climb up another tree for safety. There is an amusing anecdote of an Englishman who, being "sharp set," caught and ate a big fish into which the soul of Maharajah Gholab Sing had transmigrated. His punishment was summary. A propos of fishing, the author was as keen in baiting for the big Mahseer as he was in tracking the Markhor or the yak. Tobacco-smoking comes to most folks "as easy as lying"; but the hill-men pursue the pleasure under difficulties which might have deterred such masters of the art as Dr. Parr or Charles Lamb. They make a small hole horizontally under the surface of the ground, left open at the extremities. At one end they place the tobacco, while at the other end they kneel down, each in his turn, and inhale whiffs of smoke into their lungs. The General found cold strong tea the best remedy for the unpleasant effects caused by the rarefied mountain air. Spirits only aggravate the evil. The natives eat raw onions as a palliative. We have read many books on Himalayan, Cashmerian, and Thibetan sport, but none more pleasant, more modest, more amusing, or more instructive than that of the late Colonel of the Prince of Wales' Own Ghoorkhas.

We do not know that Mr. Barneby greatly increases our stock of information in regard to the countries which he has visited. Canada and Ceylon, and California and Japan, have been so often explored and so exhaustively described that some of us "who live at home at ease" are apt to think that the last word has been said about them. But do we digest and remember facts as readily as we learn them? Is not a "refresher" sometimes necessary to recall to one subject the minds and thoughts which have so many matters besides the history of foreign climes to occupy them. We think that such an aide mémoire is needful to most of us. We are sure that we could hardly have a more pleasant "flapper" to our memories than the author of the volume before us. The chapters on "Emigration to Canada," which he advises the general reader to skip, are among the most instructive and well-written in the book. Mr. Barneby visited in Manitoba three emigrants belonging to different positions in life, whom he had known at home. He believes that each had made a good start in life, and that a well-conducted and hard-working young man could hardly fail to succeed in that far-off settlement. There is something delightfully naïf in his placid remark on some of the drawbacks of the place:—"There is considerable danger," he says, "in some parts of sheep being picked up by wolves, but this is a subject for the settler's consideration." Like the much-quoted Irish landlord, who would not forego his rents because his agent might be shot in collecting them, Mr. Barneby is not to be deterred by wolves from recommending sheepbreeding to settlers. Like most travellers, our author thinks highly of Vancouver, where "the climate is good, the people kind, open, and hospitable. There are not the same differences in society as in England. Every one is comparatively on the same footing; but it is the footing of live and let live, with none of the nonsense of universal equality which I have noticed in some other places, and which I have generally found to be more talk than practice." In Japan Mr. Barneby was struck by the luxuriant growth of the chrysanthemums, by the pestilent smells of Tokio, and by the truthfulness to Japanese manners and customs of Mr. Gilbert's Mikado. The real Mikado he saw on the Shindbaza race-course. "He sat with a table in front of him, covered with a rich silk cloth. He is a dark-complexioned man, with more stubbly black hair about his face than is generally worn by the Japanese." Mr. Barneby was lucky in getting this glimpse of him, as the Mikado does not generally show himself in public; but he is very fond of horseracing. There was no betting-ring on the occasion, and the crowd was very orderly and quiet. The author regrets the relinquishment by the Japanese of their becoming and graceful national costume. He describes some dinners given to him by a Japanese viscount. He learned to manage the chopsticks tant bien que mal in the consumption of ordinary food; but when he was expected to dissect and eat a large lobster with them he gave up the task in despair. Fish, and meat, and rice are very cheap in Japan. Game is plentiful. Butter is scarce, and dear, and bad. Mr. Barneby thinks that the Japanese would open up the whole country to foreigners if the European Governments would relinquish their hated extra-territorial jurisdiction; but he fears that the Americans will make more way, and ultimately command more influence, in the Empire than we shall ever attain to. Glibly as we talk of the custom of hari-kari, we doubt whether we quite understand its philosophy and etiquette. Besides the judicial hari-kari, there is the custom of hari-kari as established by the unwritten code of honour. If a Japanese receives an insult from a person of his own rank, he does not appeal to the law, as in England, or to the arbitrament of the duello, as on the Continent. He has nothing to do but forthwith commit hari-kari on himself. Our traveller cannot speak too highly of the "gentle, amiable, and smiling" natives of Japan. He considers that they would make excellent European servants. We regret to say that Mr. Barneby was invalided home. On his way he visited Hong-kong, where he had reason to regret that there was no establishment for trained nurses. The community is wealthy and charitable, and could well afford to have one. In Ceylon the Coromandel people are fast supplanting the Cinghalese, who are the older race, but far less industrious and energetic. Ceylon tea, though said to be inferior to the best Darjeeling, is making rapid strides in popularity, and finds a ready sale in the English market. Mr. Barneby did not find the Isthmus of Suez "particularly interesting." Port Said has the reputation of being the largest coaling station, and one of the wickedest towns in the world. In conclusion, the author gives to intending emigrants some very wise and excellent advice:—

I would not recommend emigration to any man over forty years of age, or to any one who can see his way to getting employment at home. It has been too much the fashion to encourage good workmen to go to the colonies, leaving second-rate men at home. . . . A good workman will find England, with its institutions, its comforts, and its climate, better than any colony in the world. In another generation things may be different. . . . To young married men, resolved to emigrate, I would say, "go out first by yourself early in the year, leaving your wife at home, returning late in the autumn, and then decide after having gained experience."

THE VIKING AGE.*

THIS curious work consists of two sections—a comparatively short essay, in which a new theory of our English ancestry is propounded, and a long and copiously illustrated compendium of Scandinavian archaeology. We confess that we think Mr. Du Chaillu would have been well advised to omit the former, and rest his claim to attention on the merits of the latter. But he has a sensational theory to put forward, and no doubt he thinks to float his archaeology on the raft of such curiosity as his personal discovery will excite. We will deal first, and briefly enough, with his revolutionary theory. The general opinion of historians, of course, has been that the English conquest of Britain was undertaken by tribes of the Low-Dutch stock, who entered our island from the German shore-lands around the mouths of the Elbe and the Weser. It has always been supposed that in the fourth century these tribes, and particularly the Saxons, began to press, in recurring waves, upon the eastern shores of Britain. All this Mr. Du Chaillu desires to upset. He thinks that the invasion came from further north, from what we now know as Scandinavia. He says:—

Britain, after a continuous immigration from the North, which lasted several hundred years, became the most powerful colony of the Northern tribes, several of whose chiefs claimed a great part of England even in the seventh century. Afterwards she asserted her independence, though she did not get it until after a long and tedious struggle with the North, the inhabitants and kings of which continued to try to assert the ancient rights their forefathers once possessed.

This is a fair example of the laxity with which Mr. Du Chaillu writes, and the historical student will smile at a theory of the conquest of England founded on what may have happened so early "even as the seventh century." If Mr. Du Chaillu is going to tell us what occurred in the dawn of England he must begin further back than that. His arguments are too often of this loose type. He argues that the conquerors of England must have been Norsemen, because the latter possessed such great skill in hammering and damascening weapons; but he neglects to say where the relics of such artistically wrought swords and coats of mail have been found in this country. His inexactitude of expression is shown, moreover, in such vague generalities as these:—"Beautiful vessels of silver and gold also testify to the taste and luxury of those early times." What early times? we inquire, for there is not a date, not so much as a conjectural century, within sight. "The knowledge of the art of writing and of gilding is clearly demonstrated." When and where? From a chapter later on it is evident that Mr. Du Chaillu has become a believer in the theories of Mr. George Stephens, who thinks he has found runes on an amulet of the sixth century. There is absolutely no evidence of the great antiquity of the burnt bones of the Jæderen grave-urn. No runes, we believe, have yet been discovered which can, with any historical probability, be dated further back than the eleventh century. Nothing is proved by the famous passage in Háva-Mál about the mighty carven staves, miakstóra stafi, because who shall say from what symbols of a later civilization Háva-Mál took its imagery? The most curious record of, apparently, very early writing is to be found in that fragment of a cabalistic song which is inserted in Volsungasaga, and which enumerates all the strange places, Sleipni's teeth and Alva's ear, the Norn's nail and the owl's beak, on which the first runes were engraved before the shining God. But this spell-song does not bear the stamp of any great antiquity.

Another point upon which Mr. Du Chaillu dwells is the want of necessary civilization among those Low-Dutch tribes which are supposed to have formed the Saxon colonists of England. There is no reason to suppose, by the way, that those colonists possessed any particular claims to be considered civilized. But he certainly exaggerates what Tacitus reports of German uncouthness. The story of Arminius and Thusnelda, whether history or myth, is not a story which springs from the annals of an uncivilized race, and Ariovistus must have been quite as great a warrior and as mighty a leader of men as any Norwegian Viking. The fact is that Mr. Du Chaillu's vague theory resolves itself into an opinion that, as the Norsemen were certainly a mighty people a century or two later, they probably were mighty at the time of the English Conquest; that, being so great and so active and so warlike, they must have been doing something, and the most interesting thing they could do would be to invade England. Therefore they did invade England, and the Angles were Vikings, and England took its name from an obscure islet in the Cattegat. Whether there is or is not any ground for fancying that there may have mingled a Scandinavian element in the westward-moving hordes that conquered England, Mr. Du Chaillu's lax and sentimental conjectures cannot be held to have thrown any fresh light on the question.

Of the remainder of these bulky volumes—that is to say, of all but about thirty pages of them—we can speak with far greater warmth. These chapters testify to a very remarkable body of study, and form such a compendium of early Scandinavian archæology as certainly cannot be matched out of Scandinavia itself. Mr. Du Chaillu has read all the available texts of the Sagas, from most of which he makes shorter or longer extracts. In translating the poetic pieces he has evidently made extensive, and we should even fancy constant, use of the Corpus Poeticum Boreale of the late Dr. Gudbrand Vigfusson. He was perfectly right, of course, to employ this work; we are only sorry that he has not thought proper to mention it in his preface, nor even, so far as we have observed, in the body of his book. Mr. Du Chaillu has been eight years and a half, as he tells us, preparing these volumes, and we are glad to bear testimony to the fact that his labour has not been in vain. In a variety of instances we have compared his translations with the Icelandic text, and in each case have found him trustworthy.

Mr. Du Chaillu's method is to make the ancient literature of the North tell its own tale. His sketch of the mythology of the Vikings is no contribution to philosophical criticism, such as those admirable studies of Professor Sophus Bugge to which we lately called attention in these columns. It is simply a chain of passages, very slightly threaded, literally translated from the Eddas, and particularly from Völuspá and Grimnismál. We then proceed to the Norse cosmogony, introduced in the same way, and then to the archæology of the finds in graves of the Stone and the Bronze age. Here Mr. Du Chaillu introduces his engravings with a lavish and a welcome profusion, giving an illustration of almost every object he mentions, and this is a portion of the book which must remain of lasting value. Sometimes the commentary is almost lost in pictures, as in the chapter dedicated to the Bronze age, where, on one occasion, in eight pages we meet with only eight lines of text in all, and on another, positively with no text whatever for nineteen consecutive pages of cuts. These illustrations, in the great majority of cases, are wholly new to an English public, are very carefully executed, and form, as we have hinted, one of the chief elements of value in the volume.

The chapter on Runes is also very copiously illustrated, and gives facsimiles of all the most important early examples. We particularly note with interest the excellent print of the Tune Stone. We then proceed to a description of the objects found in bogs, and some of these are calculated to amuse and surprise the reader. At Thorsbjerg were found a pair of trousers of woven woollen cloth, a woollen blouse, and remains of a leather shoe. If Mr. Du Chaillu's measurements are correct, the wearer of the trousers must have been rather stout, for he measured thirty-eight inches and a half around the waist. The length of the legs is normal, and points to a man about six feet high. At Vimose was found one of the brynjas, or coats of mail, armed with which the Vikings rushed to battle; a bersark being one who, in his inspired frenzy, disdained this useful protection. At Kragehul, again, were dug up various evidences of a violence in warfare which is almost ghastly, such as a bundle of weapons inextricably bent and bound together in the rage of battle, and a bronze vessel hacked into rags by sword-cuts. The Nydam find includes a singularly perfect Norse boat of the Viking period, a wooden scoop for baling water, and by the side of deadly instruments of warfare such mild inventions of civilization as double-barrelled silver toothpicks and unmistakable trouser-buckles of bronze.

Mr. Du Chaillu's second volume deals in the same elaborate manner with the habits and customs of the Norsemen, with marriage and divorce, the education of children, and the traditions of warfare. On the very interesting and touching custom of so-called foster-brotherhood (föstbræðralag), which was the sacred tie between warriors otherwise unrelated, he gives a passage which we do not recollect to have met with before from Gisli Súrsson's Saga. It is so curious and picturesque that we quote it here:—

"I think it right [said Gisli] that we should bind our friendship still closer than before, and that we four swear one another foster-brotherhood." To this they consented, and went out on Eyrarhvolsoðdi (a tongue of land over the sea), and there cut from the ground a loop of turf, both ends being attached to the ground, and under this they placed a spear inlaid with ornaments, so long that a man could reach with his hand to the spear-nail. Under this were to go the four, Thorgrim, Gisli, Thorkel, and Vestein. They then drew blood from themselves, and let it run together into the mould, which had been cut under the loop of turf, and mixed together the earth and the blood; thereupon they all fell on their knees and swore on oath that each should avenge the others like a brother, and called all the gods as witnesses. They all shook hands.

This would make a magnificent subject for an historical painter.

A very curious chapter is that on the Idróttir, or athletic exercises of the Norsemen; athletics, however, including, as they hardly can be said to do in our days, the making and reciting of poetry, harp-playing, propounding riddles, and even playing at games of chess and draughts. The second volume of Mr. Du Chaillu's book closes with three interesting appendices—one on the Frankish Chronicles, another giving facsimiles of bits of existing sagas, and a third cataloguing the early coins which have been found in Scandinavia.

THE WORLD'S GREAT EXPLORERS.*

IT is the proper course for a reviewer whenever he comes across the first of a new series to express a grave doubt whether this method of publishing has not been overdone. As we, however, are inclined to think that publishers are, on the whole, fairly well acquainted with their own business, and as we are sure that however readable books on popular things are brought out they will be read, we shall pretermit any such reflections here. It is enough to notice that Messrs. Philip & Son are bringing out a new series of small books (which are not so small either) on "The World's Great Explorers," and that they have wisely begun with this Life of John Davis the Navigator, by Mr. Clements B. Markham. Looking at the list of volumes to be published, we have our doubts whether some of them may not be found superfluous—such as the promised Marco Polo, for instance—and also how far it is possible to make a book of any size out of such a subject as that of Leif Erikson and Greenland; but these are questions not necessary to be settled at present. We shall see what we shall see when they appear. Our business is with Mr. Markham's John Davis.

The first thing to be noted is that Mr. Markham has had the good sense not to fall into the beggarly pedantry of calling him "Davys." Mr. Markham is too good a general scholar to be misled into departing from the established classic form of an English name because Elizabethans were wild in the use of "i" and "y." At first sight it seems somewhat difficult to believe that a book of 266 pages could be made out of the life of John Davis without the use of padding. Neither after reading Mr. Markham's book does one get the impression that the feat has been quite accomplished. There are two supplementary chapters in it on "Following up the Work"—that is to say, on the voyages of Hudson, Fox, and Baffin to discover the North-West Passage. But why stop there? The work was followed up down to the voyage of Captain Nares, and, strictly speaking, Mr. Markham might have gone on till then. Besides, Davis sailed to the East Indies. Why, then, not give us the following up of the work in that region also? There is an excursus on early voyages into the South Seas, beginning with Magellan and going on to Sarmiento, which is almost padding, and an account of the defeat of the Armada, which is padding sans phrase. In it we notice with some amusement that Mr. Markham's habitual politeness to the Spaniards makes him speak of the tried courage and conduct of that weak-kneed and utterly inexperienced grandee of Spain, the Duke of Medina-Sidonia. Still, some, if not all, of that matter has its use for the purpose of placing Davis, and is interesting in itself. We note merely in the discharge of the critic's duty that Mr. Markham cannot keep his King Charles's head, the wickedness of the Stuart Kings, out of this book. Why, too, does Mr. Markham call the vigorous steps taken by Magellan to restore discipline in his squadron at Port San Julian a "ruthless slaughter"? He was a Portuguese, and they were Spaniards; but, after all, he was the duly appointed commander whom they had sworn on the sacraments to obey, and they were mutineers. Drake had to do a somewhat similar thing in the same port. Surely the summary execution of the mutineer Luis de Mendoza on the deck of his ship by the Alguacil, Gonzalo Gomez de Espinosa, was one of the most wonderful incidents of those marvellous times. If it was a crime, it was a splendid one. Finally, we deny that the first voyage of circumnavigation should be credited to Sebastian del Cano (or de Elcano, as Navarrete calls him) because Magellan was killed in the middle of the voyage. The getting through the Straits was the great feat. Anybody could have brought a ship home from the Spice Islands; but, had it not been for Magellan, none of the squadron would ever have entered the Pacific at all. To him, therefore, belongs the glory, not to Elcano. Mr. Markham's picture of John Davis we can accept without reserve. It is a spirited, readable account of a most noteworthy man. Davis was the central figure in two of the great maritime enterprises of the Elizabethan and early Jacobean time in the effort to find a passage to Asia by the North-West, and then in the opening of the Indian trade. The second is greatly the more important of the two. One grudges to speak evil of anything which has given occasion for so much heroism as the North-West voyages, but after all they have led only to the discovery that, if there is a North-West passage, it is useless except to icebergs, and perhaps whales. The voyages to the East have led to the foundation of a mighty Empire. Davis's services in this great work were vital. He learned the road in Houtman's voyage, and he showed it to Lancaster. Moreover, he was the father of English scientific seamanship. His invention of the back-staff called Davis Quadrant alone entitled him to his honourable name of "The Navigator." He died appropriately enough at sea; being slain in an outbreak of some Japanese whom his commander, Michelborne, had "relieved." Mr. Markham repeats the story that the Japanese were pirates; but, like other historians, gives no proof. As it is clear that the English were rifling the "Japas'" cargo at the moment they broke out, some doubts arise in the sceptical mind as to which side was "pirate" for the time being. A Japanese version might give a new colour to the story.

HOW TO CATALOGUE A LIBRARY.*

COMMENCING librarians and bibliophiles, collectors of books, and others needing compendious instruction in the mysteries of cataloguing, will find their wants ministered to in a convenient form by Mr. H. B. Wheatley's shapely little volume. Without going to the bottom of vexed questions, Mr. Wheatley explains in sufficient detail the character of the problems to be dealt with by the catalogue-maker, and states the solutions which have been accepted or proposed by considerable authorities. There is one surprising error of fact, the statement that the system of a card-catalogue "has been adopted at the Bodleian Library by Mr. Nicholson." We can assure Mr. Wheatley from very recent personal inspection that the alphabetical catalogue of the Bodleian stands in its volumes where it did, and that there is not, and never has been, any intention or project of superseding it by a card-catalogue. On the important and unsettled questions connected with classified catalogues and subject-indexes we find Mr. Wheatley disappointingly meagre. However, there is quite enough information given both on this and on other matters to convince any reader who may be in need of conviction that the art of cataloguing books is anything but one that comes by nature, and that the correct application of its principles to even a small collection is by no means a process of contemptible facility, nor beneath the dignity of scholarship. The reader may even learn that he does not know all about it when he has read the book through. To say this much is, as all scholars will perceive, as strong a testimony as one can well give to the book's honest quality. No doubt it is possible to make too much fuss about rules of cataloguing. An ideal set of rules will hardly get made, and meanwhile libraries have to be worked somehow. Every one who frequents any great library which has an accessible catalogue (a necessary qualification, for the greatest in the world has not one) must learn the ways and rules of its particular catalogue, in order to make the best use of his privileges. What he has a right to expect is that the rules shall be known and shall be uniformly adhered to. A good deal of captious criticism would be saved by remembering that in these things any rule not obviously absurd is much better than none. Let us conclude with the first words which the present writer remembers to have heard from Henry Bradshaw in the Cambridge University Library—"You should learn to use the catalogue."

VITTORIA COLONNA.†

MUCH as has been written about Vittoria Colonna, there was room in English for a short monograph based directly on the original texts and authorities. Such a monograph has been very well supplied by Miss Lawley. Probably the peculiar charm which Vittoria has always exercised (or at least has exercised since attention began to be paid to the heroes and heroines of the Italian Renaissance) is due to her remarkable combination of different attractions appealing to different classes of people. She was beautiful enough and personally charming enough to satisfy any devotee of beauty and grace; while her unblemished character has attracted those who cry "fie, fie!" when belated lovers expatiate on the charms of Lucrezia Borgia (as she used to be before she was whitewashed and made insignificant), or of the youngest Marguerite de Valois. Although opinions differ in respect to her poems, at least as much as opinions usually do differ about the stately and somewhat artificial sonnets of Italy, few lovers of poetry who know what poetry is will refuse a very high rank among poetesses, if not among poets, to the author of "Non dee temer del mondo affanni o guerra," and the sonnet to her sister-in-law, "S'io potessi sottrar dal giogo alquanto." Further, she occupies the unique position of having been the wife, apparently the dearly beloved and dearly loving wife, of one of the greatest soldiers of an age of great soldiers, and afterwards the platonic idol of the greatest artist in an age of giants in art. The wife of Pescara and the adored of Michelangelo would have been almost interesting enough as such. Yet these attachments of hers were but a part of Vittoria's attraction. To persons interested in theological matters she offers the further bait of being, through her connexion with the Moderate-Catholic school of Pole and Contarini, and her friendship for the more audacious Ochino, an "elect lady" of unusual distinction. Lastly, for those who love anecdotic history, though great part of her life is little known, the celebrated conversations attributed to the Portuguese painter, Francesco d'Ollanda, give ample pasture. If to some tastes Vittoria is a little too invariably sage and sober, if they desire a little more flesh and blood and a little less literature and divinity, a little more of Venus and less of Pallas, why of course they are very unreasonable persons, and can go elsewhere.

For others Miss Lawley has provided a very agreeable sketch. She has, with some (acknowledged) help, translated those of Vittoria's own sonnets which she quotes very well; she has wisely borrowed from Mr. Symonds's excellent version of those of Michelangelo; she has given for the first time a letter of Charles V. to Vittoria after Pavia, and some other matter. And her general estimate is as sensible and moderate as her style is free from the intolerable flummery and floweriness to which ladies writing about the Italian Renaissance have accustomed us of late. Almost the only unfavourable criticism (and that is hardly unfavourable) that we have to make is that perhaps she is rather hard on Pescara's later proceedings. They were sometimes cruel and treacherous no doubt; but we have yet to be acquainted with the soldier-statesman of the early sixteenth century who was not cruel and treacherous when cruelty and treachery seemed likely to serve his turn.

NEW PRINTS.

FROM Messrs. Buck & Reid, of 179 New Bond Street, we have received examples of Mr. Edward Slocombe's gifts in two branches of art. "On the Way" is a mezzotint engraving after a picture, by Miss Maude Goodman, which was exhibited in last year's Royal Academy. It represents a solitary minx, with expressive eyes, seated on rocks a little above the level of the sea, hugging a rustic basket. Nothing will persuade us that a gentleman is not advancing in her direction; that particular expression is never wasted on the winds and waves. The execution is rather thin and poor, and too much is made of those extraordinary eyes; but it is a pretty print, and likely to be popular. "On the Seine at Rouen" is an original study in pure etching. The masts of the port and the romantic spires and towers of the city make an effective series of points upon the sky-line. But, here also, we confess we think the work a little slight, and the difficulties of aquatic and aerial perspective are shirked in a manner scarcely worthy of so accomplished an etcher as Mr. Slocombe.

FRENCH LITERATURE—EMILE AUGIER.

WITH the exception of the case of Victor Hugo, which is a general exception, no such gap has been made in the ranks of French men of letters during the present decade as that made by the death, in his seventieth year, of M. Emile Augier, on Friday week. For M. Augier was the almost unquestioned, and by all competent judges quite unquestionable, head of the one literary department in which his country has surpassed all Europe for many years. He had indeed a little nursed his reputation, had something condescended to faire Charlemagne, as Victor Hugo never did. For our parts, we neither praise nor blame him for his caution in remaining "on velvet" with Les Fourchambault. It is more a question of individual temperament than of anything else, and the wise will praise the gallantry of Corneille and the discretion of Racine equally. During the course of his five-and-thirty years' wooing of the popular favour, M. Augier had at least his share of the ups and downs which fall to the dramatist's lot even more than to that of most men of letters. He started with La Ciguë (in verse, of course) on the full backwater of reaction from Romanticism which for a time carried Ponsard and others into the haven of popular favour. But Augier and Ponsard were many miles asunder, and the author of Lucrèce could no more have written L'Aventurière, which M. Augier produced a year or two after his début, when he was barely twenty-eight, than Cumberland could have written the School for Scandal, or Southern Love for Love. To attempt to catalogue, much more to annotate, the great number of plays which filled up the thirty years from L'Aventurière to Les Fourchambault would be idle. The important thing is to notice that M. Augier, while writing in very various forms and on all sorts of subjects, constantly observed the Moliéresque tradition of castigat ridendo mores. This is observable even in La Ciguë, and the note rarely fails in the voluminous work of the author. Sometimes, no doubt, it is insisted on too much. The fault of contemporary French drama, just as the fault of our own, has long been the representation of manners which are not, and never were, on land or sea. M. Augier now and then attempted more or less historical dramas as in Diane, which even Rachel could not carry off; he wrote non-dramatic verses, and he enjoyed the perhaps unique distinction of having written a verse-comedy in five acts which he, though the most popular dramatist of his day, never tried to get acted. Indeed, all his earlier work was in verse, including that famous or infamous Gabrielle which outraged French notions of decency by "sacrificing the lover to the husband," and attracted much juster criticism (including some satirical remarks from Baudelaire, which might open the eyes of those who regard the poet as an idle poseur) by its absurd concluding line:—

O père de famille, ô poète, je t'aime.

But, though M. Augier was not an unskilful verse-smith, prose satire of contemporary manners was his forte. In this vein, collaborating with M. Jules Sandeau (a collaboration which had borne fruit before and bore it again), he produced the admirable Gendre de M. Poirier. If, as is said, the author was serious when he at first entitled it La revanche de Georges Dandin, M. Augier's possession of that highest dramatic faculty which consists in not "taking a side" might be contested, but this is not necessary. In Les effrontés and Le fils de Giboyer, the attack on the society of the day (and, for the matter of that, of the century) is more direct, and the hold on perennial criticism of life perhaps not less. It cannot be positively affirmed that M. Augier's later work contained anything quite so good as the best of the pieces already mentioned, but he never fell much below himself.

His success was assisted by or derived from three peculiarities. From more than one thing which has already been said, it will be seen that M. Augier was an example of a type which has produced the best comic work of France, a bourgeois type—hard-headed, a little borné, a little Philistine, occasionally, for all its wit, a little absurd, but sensible, manly, and practical to the core. To this temperament he added literary talent (not by itself exactly of the first order, but considerable, and derived, it may be, from his maternal grandfather, that rather undervalued oddity Pigault-Lebrun), and a wonderful science of the stage. Compared with his two special rivals, MM. Sardou and Dumas fils, he had less wit and less fecundity of imagination than the first, less enthusiasm as to social questions than the second; but a much greater purely dramatic faculty than either, and especially a much more even and abundant supply of dramatic moyens. The most literary person cannot accuse M. Augier of the defects of Scribe; the most "stagy" cannot contest his knowledge of stagecraft; the most ardent partisan of the view that the theatre must be actual cannot refuse him actuality; the severest condemner of the merely ephemeral cannot deny that he brings his sketches of the passing to a great extent into the region of that which does not pass. It is quite possible that posterity will adjudge him a place among those who have utilized to the utmost numerous talents not of the highest rather than among those who have shown the highest talent in any one way; but we do not think that it will refuse him the position of the best all-round dramatist of this generation.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

IT is no fault of Mr. F. Turner that his Life of General Boulanger (Swan Sonnenschein & Co.) should have appeared at an unfortunate moment. Written immediately before the recent elections, and inspired by a not unnatural confidence in General Boulanger's cause and its prospects, it was hardly to be expected that Mr. Turner should be deterred from the venture of a rosy forecast. The homely advice of Hosea Biglow against playing the prophet "without knowing" could be but vanity and an impolitic thing to a thoroughgoing advocate writing at a critical moment. "The forthcoming elections," says Mr. Turner, "will be a definite ratification of the General's policy." The elections are passed, and matters are pretty much as they were. It is easy, after the event, to smile at Mr. Turner's assurance of victory, and easy, too, to forget that many thousands of people were not less assured of the General's further progress, if not of his immediate triumph. In the meanwhile, waiting the next "forthcoming elections," or the unforeseen "impossible" that always happens, the subject of Mr. Turner's biography remains an interesting figure, and, bating a little extravagance of enthusiasm, the book is as readable as it is interesting.

Heroines of Scotland, by Robert Scott Fittis (Alexander Gardner), is better than the promise of the title, which is too suggestive of the tiresome yet exemplary "self-made man" class of books. The narratives of Mr. Fittis are tersely written, and the writer has properly followed a wide and patriotic view of the qualifications of a heroine. He has drawn from historical and legendary sources in his illustrations of feminine valour, devotion, and endurance, and in the latter section has made excellent use of the profuse ballad literature at hand. Helen of Kirkconnell, Margaret Campbell, "the lady of Towie," the pathetic story of Helen of Ardoch, the unfortunate Bessie Bell and Mary Gray of Lynedoch, and other inspirers of popular song, are celebrated anew by Mr. Fittis, and we cannot say, so perennial is the charm of romance, that we tire of the themes. Mr. Fittis has no narrow ideal of the Scottish heroines. He finds room for that stout-hearted dame Ann Keith, Lady Methven, who headed her armed retainers against the Solemn League and Covenant, and worsted the foe by superior strategy; and he glorifies the Countess of Buchan, whom Edward, "the Southron Vampire," Mr. Fittis calls him, caused to be caged at Berwick. That this courageous lady forsook her husband and the Comyn faction to follow the Bruce is entirely to her credit, Mr. Fittis opines, notwithstanding the plain censure of the English chronicler. What should Matthew of Westminster know about it? asks Mr. Fittis. Patriotism, pure patriotism, moved her, despite the record of the Southron libeller, and patriotism possibly sways Mr. Fittis. By the way, in addition to Mary Bruce, who was clapped into a cage in Roxburgh Castle, other examples of the kind might be cited. Mr. Fittis knows no other case of an important prisoner caged save the Sultan Bajazet I.; but did not Louis XI. so dispose of a high and inconvenient personage, who was less patient than Isabel of Buchan?

The dramatic form represented by an anonymous and notable volume before us—Plays (Greenock: John Davidson)—is something altogether alien to the stage art of to-day. If we would class the author's "Unhistorical Pastoral," "Romantic Farce," and "Scaramouch in Naxos," we should assign them a place somewhat between the Elizabethan Arcadia and the Jacobean Masques. But of their representation in a public theatre we are less hopeful than of a popular revival of the works of Fletcher or Randolph. They should be played in the artistic humour of the writer, and to play them fitly were a courtly pastime; an interlude in a fête after Watteau, perhaps, or an episode in some princely entertainment in the style that obtained in great Eliza's reign. The "Unhistorical Pastoral," though not novel in plot, is a charming conception, delicately wrought; the quality of the poetry, with its curious elaboration of hyperbole, its wayward, volatile fancy, and occasional Sidneian graces of expression, is decidedly Elizabethan. Perhaps the author is open to the censure applied by Ben Jonson to Guarini's famous pastoral in that he does not "keep decorum" in making all the characters speak alike. Cinthio, though "a foundling and a vulgar shepherd," is a courtier and lover, with an unfailing command of poetic diction. Eulalie, though a country quean reared by a poor woman, is of the same order of beings. She is melancholy in the fashion:—

I'll rebaptize my melancholy, love,
With dropping tears of virgin purity,
Claiming its soul for spotless chastity.

But they are both of noble birth, and the scene is the Kingdom of Belmarie and of faerie, too, where all things are possible, and the wings of fancy play free and fly far. "A Romantic Farce" is less pleasing; its scheme is too flimsy and artificial; but the pantomime "Scaramouch in Naxos" is a delightful piece of invention—bright, jocund, fantastic, though not for the grosser stage designed. And of the author we may say, with the clown in his farce,

We've marked him well, but know not who he is;
He seems to be acquaint with comic writers.

It could readily be shown by culling passages from Sappho (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.) that Mr. C. A. Dawson's poem possesses many beauties, yet the work as a whole leaves but a languid sense of pleasure. The figure of Sappho is not dramatically presented. She is a study, rather; conceived in the modern spirit, and not unsuggestive of the Princess. It is hard to feel that such passion as she evinces at the perfidy of Phaon is either deep or tragic. The climax, in fact, is a little tame. Sappho, as the "leader of the woman's hope," in the sense of an emancipator of the sex, is not, and could scarcely be, an impressive personage.

Of Mr. A. F. Heaton's poems, Now and Then (Elliot Stock), it must be said that the aim may be high, though the expression is none of the clearest. Here is a dusky stanza from "The City of the Soul":—

Experience bids thee fling away ambition;
The still self-conquest for the sacred Sake
Hold more than loud return from martial mission,
And join the pageant in true Glory's wake.

Mr. Joseph Thomas Chapman—Poems (Bristol: Arrowsmith)—would be better advised if he should eschew verse for prose henceforth as an advocate of philanthropy and the unfettered pursuit of truth. On the poet's own showing, there are too many poets:—

Nations have their poets, sighing, singing, grumbling,
Seeking truth by twilight, halting, often stumbling,
Nature, too, has poets round us everywhere;
Ocean to himself his deep thoughts fondly mumbling,
All his billowy stanzas touching here and there.

And he goes on to bid us all to live "each a stanza, cheerful, tender, true"; which, with the example quoted, is not bad counsel.

Dr. G. V. Poore's London, Ancient and Modern (Cassell & Co.) is a study of the metropolis from the sanitary and medical point of view that should command the attention of all London ratepayers. It is well written and well illustrated.

Mr. Alexander Rogers's Persian Anthology (Bevington & Co.) is a small collection of specimens, done into English verse, from the Rubaiyat, the Gulistân, and a fairly representative selection from the Anvâr-i-Suheilî. Of the increasing study of Early English in America we have pleasing evidence in the translations by Professor Garnett, of Virginia University, Elene, Judith, Athelstan, and Byrhtnoth (Boston: Ginn). The Gothic Handbook, by the Revs. W. M. Ramsay and C. D. Ramsay (Wells Gardner, Darton, & Co.), was, it seems, in course of compilation when Mr. Le Marchant Douse's work, The Gothic of Ulfilas, appeared. There should be a useful field for the present and smaller book, which comprises a grammar and a succinct introduction of the language and its literature.

We have also received Nature Stories, Myths, and Phantasies, by "Young Pan," a book that will please young naturalists (Hamilton, Adams, & Co.); Monopolies and the People, by C. W. Baker, C.E., a thoughtful study on a prominent "question of the day" (Putnam's Sons); Men and Women, by James Platt, F.S.S. (Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.); and Laurie's Universal Code for Private and Business Telegrams, a concise and really comprehensive pocket-guide to the subject by R. N. Laurie, M.A., and Augustus A. Hayes, M.A. (Effingham Wilson).

THE HISTORY of the ENGLISH CONSTITUTION. By Dr. RUDOLPH GNEIST, Professor of Law in the University of Berlin. Translated by PHILIP A. ASHWORTH, of the Inner Temple, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

* This Edition contains additional chapters on the Parliaments of the Nineteenth Century down to the Third Reform Bill (1884-85), with an important Note giving the Author's views on the Irish question, and a New and Copious Index.

"No foreigner has done more than Professor Gneist to examine and make clear the history and nature of the English Constitution..... He discusses such vital questions as 'Whither are we drifting?' 'How far do recent changes in the franchise accord with the old spirit of the Constitution?' 'What is in store for us with democracy supreme?' On such questions as these the opinion of a foreigner, who is a scholar, but no bookworm, and has sedulously studied our institutions, is certainly much more weighty than that of most Englishmen..... At this time these volumes are especially instructive. They cast light on almost all the great questions of current politics."—Times.

THE NEW LIFE OF STEELE.

Now ready, 2 vols. demy 8vo. 32s.

THE

LIFE OF RICHARD STEELE.

By G. A. AITKEN.

WITH NUMEROUS PORTRAITS.

Athenæum.—"A remarkable instance of what may be accomplished by industry and perseverance. We are confident that all who are interested in the history of that epoch will be grateful to Mr. Aitken for this valuable contribution to our knowledge of Steele, his contemporaries, and his time."

Academy.—"Rarely, indeed, has a work of biography issued from the press showing a greater desire for accurate information on all points left previously in doubt, or a better good fortune in obtaining the facts which had eluded the search of earlier inquirers. . . . It will be a difficult task for any subsequent labourer to glean from the fields which his latest biographer has passed through."

Daily Telegraph.—"We can honestly recommend Mr. Aitken's biography. He has done his work most exhaustively, and the result is the production of this really important addition to the libraries of all lovers of English literature. It was a long-needed book, and it comes in good time."

Punch.—"Most interesting and amusing are these two volumes about Steele, the scholar for whom among the wits and humourists of the past Thackeray entertained so strong an affection."

MARY HOWITT'S REMINISCENCES.

Now ready, 2 vols. medium 8vo. 32s.

MARY HOWITT:

An Autobiography.

Edited by her Daughter, MARGARET HOWITT.

WITH PORTRAITS AND NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

Times.—"We have greatly enjoyed the frank and simple narrative, and we have been interested in hearing much we never knew about two of our oldest and dearest literary friends. Howitt and his wife are inseparably associated with all that is enchanting in rural England."

Standard.—"It is simply one of the most charming studies of still life that has appeared for a long time."

Globe.—"The work as a whole is a worthy monument of not only one, but two careers, marked by honest and excellent work, much of which the world will not let willingly die. The volumes are admirably got up, being illustrated both freely and attractively."

ARTISTIC EDITIONS FOR CONNOISSEURS AND MEN OF TASTE.

It is proposed to include in this illustrated historical series only such works as are of high literary reputation, and which vividly portray the various epochs of history, and give scope to the individual artists who will illustrate them to portray the scenes, costumes, manners, furniture, and architecture of the various epochs described. It is hoped the volumes will interest connoisseurs and men of taste as much for their artistic as their literary merits. The following are the first two volumes of this Series:—

Imperial 8vo. cloth, gilt top, price 35s. net, with over 100 Engravings on Wood; also 50 Copies on fine Japan Paper.

THE CHOUANS. By H. DE BALZAC. With 100 Engravings on Wood by Leveille, from Drawings by Julien Le Blant. Newly Translated into English by GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

NOTE.—“The Chouans,” by Balzac, is now translated into English for the first time, and it may be of interest to note that this work was penned on the very spot where the drama took place, amidst recollections still recent and amongst ruins. It is also interesting to notice that Balzac with this book opened up the quarry in which he never ceased to work. In this story, so full of agitation, so ominous and mysterious, of the supreme convulsions of the Civil War in Brittany, we find not merely indicating, but already fully developing, the clear perspicuity, the intense realistic power, the patient and minute description, and the delicacy of induction which form the chief ingredients of the talent of the author of the “Comédie Humaine.”

Imperial 8vo. cloth, gilt top, price 35s. net, with over 100 Engravings on Wood; also 50 Copies on fine Japan Paper.

A CHRONICLE of the REIGN of CHARLES IX. By PROSPER

MÉRIMÉE. With 110 Engravings on Wood from Drawings by Edouard Toudouze. Newly Translated into English by GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

NOTE.—The cabaret scene of the opening, with the gracious if naughty figure of Mila for centre, is as well conceived as anything in Dumas himself, and far better written.

THE SHEPHEARDES CALENDER. By EDMUND SPENSER.

The Original Edition of 1579 in Photographic Facsimile. With an Introduction by H. OSKAR SOMMER, Ph.D., Editor of the New Reprint of Caxton's Edition of the “Morte d'Arthur.”

Extract from Dr. Sommer's Preface.

Spenser's “Shepheardes Calender” was in its day a book of great interest, not only because it made the world acquainted with “the new poet,” but also because it contained allusions to personages of distinction well known, and to circumstances familiar to everybody. From 1579–97, in a space of eighteen years, it passed through five different editions.

In our days the little book is still interesting, but for other reasons. Firstly, as the earliest work of importance by the writer of “The Faerie Queen.” Secondly, because, as Dean Church in his “Life of Spenser” appropriately observes, it marks a “turning-point” in the history of English literature; twenty years had passed since the publication of Tottel's Miscellany, and the appearance of “The Shepheardes Calender” gave a new impulse to English poetry. Thirdly, from the mysterious circumstances connected with its publication.

AFRICA.

IT is perhaps natural that the first comments made upon the successive despatches which have been received from Mr. STANLEY should have busied themselves chiefly with the safety, or the near approach to safety, of that explorer and of the heroic German whom he went to rescue or to discover, and who is said to accompany him. We certainly do not want Mr. STANLEY killed, and still less do we want the blood of EMIN Pasha to deepen the still undeleted, and we fear indelible, stain which rests on Mr. GLADSTONE, in the first place, and then on all England for permitting Mr. GLADSTONE to incur it. Even now, after the news of the massacre of Dr. PETERS and his fellows, there is some fear that the refugees from Wadelai may not "win through." With regard to Dr. PETERS himself, we bestow on his memory all the regret due to a man of undoubted learning, energy, patriotism, and courage—four most excellent things—but we are rather unwilling to lend a fresh whisk to the lather of soft soap with which some other English writers have bedaubed it. To speak the plain truth, Dr. PETERS was a well-meaning, but very mischievous, person. No one represented more than he did the blundering belief in Corporal SCHLAG as the sole agent in dealing with "natives" which has brought such difficulties on Germany; no one made such persistent efforts to embroil his country with England; no one disregarded with such audacious indifference the sufficiently generous allotment of "spheres of influence" to his own side. He had no business to be where he was when he died; the inconveniences of his decease will chiefly fall on the guiltless head of the British East African Company, and we may be sure that the first thing which Prince BISMARCK himself said, on hearing of the Doctor's end, was, in some form or other, "Que diable allait-il faire?" So far, STANLEY and EMIN have escaped, it would seem, a like fate. But, if it be well that Mr. STANLEY and EMIN should have escaped, this is about all that is well about the news. It tells, with some gaps and discrepancies (for, though we are told that EMIN and JEPHSON were prisoners, we are not told how they escaped), of the breaking down of the last stand made against Mahdist barbarism, of the crumbling up of the last remnant of that remarkable structure of at least semi-civilized dominion which the ambition of ISMAIL Pasha, and the devotion of Sir SAMUEL BAKER, of GORDON, of EMIN himself, and of other men, built up, and which the irresolution and faintheartedness of English statesmen have allowed to be overthrown. From the border where our troops are playing the Roman legionary far down the Nile to the furthest Equatorial lakes everything is at the mercy of the Dervishes; anarchy once more rules; the Devil has once more broken loose. This is a sufficiently unsatisfactory state of things as it is, and unluckily it is impossible not to suspect that the measures taken to "relieve" EMIN only made it worse. It is at least possible, though the meagreness of the reports makes it difficult certainly to assert it, that EMIN's being called away from his threatened northern borders to meet STANLEY far to the south had something to do with the revolt of his, up to that time, faithful troops. And it seems quite certain that Mr. STANLEY's ill-advised selection of the Congo route, with its consequences, so weakened his expedition that he could give little effectual aid to the Pasha. As it is, the net result of the expedition, even setting aside the death of Major BARTHELOT, of that most gallant and cheery of men Mr. JAMESON, and of others, amounts to this, that the Equatorial province has been handed over to the Mahdists, and the Upper Congo has been handed over to TIPPOO TIB—a result in which it must be a very sanguine man who can find anything cheering. It is possible, of course, that this closing in once more of darkness over the whole region round the heads of the two great rivers may be only a darkness before a better dawn. Germany and England may divide between them the task of introducing something like tolerable conditions of life, instead of savagery tempered by slave-trading—the former in the district west of her Zanzibar "sphere" and reaching the Congo State territory, the latter in the region round the now multiplying Nyanzas, and thence Nilewards. So have we seen the youthful mind, cast down for a moment at the collapse of a card castle or a brick tower, comforted by levelling such few cards or bricks as remain so as to "start fresh."

We must, however, wait for more extended news of this almost wholly luckless expedition before finally pronouncing upon it. There are other matters more or less closely connected with it which invite some comment. There is a good deal of assertion and contradiction as to the exchanges of opinion between the English and the German Foreign Offices as to the coast and islands beyond Vitu. It may be hoped that there will be no relaxation of firmness on the part of our own representatives in this matter. In the original division of "spheres of influence" England certainly did not err on the side of stinginess in assigning to Germany a portion to which some persons, usually very fertile in resource, have sometimes been puzzled to know how Germany came to have any claim whatever. But her claim was made, was acknowledged, and, as we have always argued here, must be held sacred. There is, however, no reason whatever why that claim should be further extended, and certainly no extension of it on the northern coast ought for a moment to be admitted. Equal firmness ought to be shown, and there is good hope that it is being shown, in reference to the other end of the East African coastline, which is not actually British territory—in reference, that is to say, to the navigation of the Zambesi and the highlands of the Shire. According to accounts which have been published, Mr. H. H. JOHNSTON'S mission as Consul to Mozambique has already borne good fruit in the exploration of the mouths of the great river. We wish that more uncertainty did not rest on the not far distant Swaziland question. Since we wrote on that question, the Colonial Office has, indeed, given a denial to the rumour that Sir FRANCIS DE WINTON'S mission covers an already-arranged surrender to the Boers. But there are very ominous signs that the Cape Ministry (who are too frequently to be found treating the Afrikaner party as American politicians treat the Irish) wish to curry favour with the Transvaal and the partisans of the Transvaal by surrendering a district which concerns themselves less than it concerns Natal, and which, if given up, would be a sop to their Dutch supporters. We can only say that, if the abandonment is carried out, the present Government will have taken on its shoulders no small share of the curse due for that abandonment of the Transvaal, which, in some people's opinion, was a greater political, though a less moral, crime than the abandonment of GORDON itself.

A pleasanter subject is the creation of British "Zambesia," which formally took place by charter last week, of which the Cape authorities, hoping thereout to suck advantage, have been graciously pleased to approve, and from meddling with which it is to be very sincerely hoped that their hands will be kept till a better political theory prevails at Capetown. This charter, though at present the territories with which it deals be a little in nubibus, is a very pleasant document to read; and one cannot help wishing that the fashion of it had come in a few years sooner, in which case several valuable districts of the earth which are now under the influence of foreign nations would have been reserved by and for ourselves. It is a thoughtful document, taking within its purview possible harbours which might be useful to the QUEEN'S ships, though the sea-coast of at least most of the Company's "sphere" is much as that of Bohemia, exempting the Company from mortmain restrictions in regard to five acres of land in England, reserving public rights, minutely particularizing private rights, and in other ways taking time by the forelock. And it is well known that all this is not merely "paper" (as TIPPOO TIB said of the neighbouring association on the Congo), that the Company is based upon a real and solid foundation of trade and influence already laid, and to some extent already built upon. Some doubt has been expressed—not merely by those who naturally hate anything which seems likely to extend the greatness of England, but by others—as to the reversion to the system of chartered Companies, with quasi-political rights, which has been so recently exemplified in the cases of the Niger Company, the Borneo Company, the East African Company, and now the South African. The dubiety seems unnecessary. The practice is a good old one, to begin with, though it had a little fallen into desuetude; and the haphazard colonization which succeeded it has certainly shown no great improvement. But, in fact, the real justification is that modern politics, at least in England, make it sometimes difficult for the State itself to annex openly, and that the recent awakening of European nations to the fact that they need swarming-grounds threatens a somewhat rapid exhaustion of the swarming-grounds available. The world is just now being "claimed" with remarkable rapidity; and, though long heads and strong hands will undoubtedly in the long run profit by the claims of incompetent and hasty speculators, it hardly does to trust to this only. The chartered Company is a most convenient warming-pan for the State, as well as a useful method of regimenting and directing private enterprise, and we do not care how many examples we see of it. Only let the promoters of such Companies remember certain dismal examples which, to avoid ill omens, shall be nameless, and they can hardly fail to do well.

THE PLEASURES OF BALDNESS.

"THAT bald CÆSAR the famed Roman wight" is known to have disliked being bald. Hence, his detractors declared, his love of the laurels of victory. Certainly it were a seemly thing if our elderly generals could dine out and go to the play in such laurels as they may happen to have won; for baldness, though indispensable to a young doctor or solicitor, and highly desirable in a statesman, is not coveted by the sons of MARS. A young physician, in a letter to one of the papers, very touchingly bewails the slimness of his purse and the thickness of his ambrosial locks. The "high and domelike forehead" which is admired in the busts and effigies of SHAKESPEARE seems to this youth a feature indispensable in his profession. Yet he, of all men, should have the remedy at hand, and be skilled in the depilatory art. He has only to purchase or mix the antidote to those prescriptions for lengthening and thickening the tresses which are advertised in the beautiful decorations of our hoardings. It has been subtly remarked that many wise and wealthy persons remain bald, and hence it has been inferred that the inventions of Mrs. ALLEN and others are not invariably soveran. But, perhaps, the wealthy and the wise are intelligent enough to keep the advantages which nature or the wearing of ill-ventilated hats has given them. They know when they are well off, like the poet and orator, C. LICINIUS CALVUS, who, after the manner of the Living Skeleton, was probably "proud of the title." The young doctor values a head early denuded at about 500*l.* a year, and, really, if he is acquainted with his business, he ought soon to possess that "shining place," where, as the elderly riddle quaintly remarks, "there is no parting." He thinks that a flowing beard has also its market value, yet he does not seem to have remarked that the owners of flowing beards are usually very bald men. It is as if nature could not support the growth of so much hair in two places at once. By leaving the chin unshorn the head may be brought, as it seems, into the desired condition. "Even the lower animals," he maintains, have an admiring affection for the ornament which he desires, and he illustrates this by the waggishness of an ostrich. The benighted bird attempted to hatch the head of a sleeping Englishman—in South Africa, we presume. This was flattering, but embarrassing on the whole, for the ostrich is a bird with a strong sense of its personal dignity. "Hell has no fury like" an ostrich duped, in its maternal instincts especially, nor can one seriously believe that the Englishman was the happier for the fowl's misplaced affection. If the young physician is right, we may perhaps expect to see depilatories as popularly recommended as the contrary kind of nostrum. But, while a dozen advertisers offer to make the fat thin, nobody has yet discovered a way of making the thin fat. Baldness, according to the doctor, is the result of fatty degeneration, and persons naturally lean cannot, by taking thought, degenerate in this desirable direction. Sitting up late in an atmosphere of gas may do a good deal, and the tall hat of modern life is also valuable to persons who covet an appearance of precocious wisdom. Every kind of dissipation is also recommended; but this prescription has obvious disadvantages, and is even uncertain. It is not recorded that Mr. BOB SAWYER and Mr. BENJAMIN ALLEN rose in their profession by baldness; yet no young men ever did more to deserve this gift. To be early grey seems rather the privilege of poets than of physicians, if we may judge by the cases of SHELLEY and RONSARD. There is reason to believe that BYRON would have been bald had he lived a little longer, and it is a matter of curious speculation whether his success would not have waned with his curls and when his days were really in the yellow leaf. On the other hand, he was just the man to wear a wig. The poet, in the following stanza, celebrates a sage who, perhaps alone among mankind, agreed with the young doctor:—

There was an old person of Bristol
Who had a bald head and a pistol;
He shot all the Aldermen
Because they were balder men—
And then blew out his brains with the pistol.

THE LATEST NOVELTIES.

THREE new things are discussed in the first three articles of the November Nineteenth Century. New these things are called, at any rate; but, however much they may be desired by Mr. FREDERIC HARRISON, who sings of the New Trades-Unionism; by the Duke of MARLBOROUGH, who is all for a New Toryism which shall lead Labour against Capital; by Mr. CRACKANTHORPE, who more reasonably hopes for a New Party in which Liberals and Conservatives shall combine their more popular principles, they are but ideas and aspirations yet. They lack the substantiality of next year's new potatoes, and are far less likely to come to growth.

In explaining "Tory Democracy" the Duke's paper just misses perfection. If he had opened the door to his own meaning a little wider, out it would have come, with every rag of deception or self-deception stripped from it. Even as it is, however, there is no misunderstanding the Blenheim invention, as expounded by the head of the House. Let us see what the Duke says about it. We start from the assertion that the Radicalism of the Liberal party has never been anything else than a selfish imposture. It is all bourgeois; in nothing really democratic. The Radical-Liberal party is the capitalists', manufacturers', shopkeepers' party. Toryism has its main support from landowners and real estate. It was easy for the Radical-Liberal party to make itself popular by denouncing the privileges and profits of landowners, bourgeois Radicalism having no great stake in land. It was easy for them to make capital out of Free-trade; for cheap bread meant large profits to manufacturers first of all. It was easy for them to do away with indirect taxation: income-tax was far less a burden to wealthy manufacturers and financiers than it would be to landowners. It was easy, again, to place a variety of general charges on land, and to do "justice to Ireland" where no one was affected but landowners and ecclesiastical corporations. In short, the reforms of Liberal legislation have in nearly every case been effected at the expense of the other party, which has been held up to public odium at the same time. There is a great deal of truth in this statement, no doubt; and it was never more true than to-day, when the attack on "land" is preached as a kind of moral duty. But now let us see what more the Duke of MARLBOROUGH has to say. Proposing to turn the tables, he makes the following remarks. While year after year Liberal reformers central their endeavours on placing the landed interests in the pilory of popular opinion, "the very party that was occupied "in this pastime was growing fat in trade, in speculation, "in banking, in industry, earned by the labour of the very "classes whose animosity it was stimulating against land-owners." The creation of all this wealth "seems somehow to have been overlooked." The masses have not sufficiently observed that an impoverished aristocracy of land has been superseded by an enormously rich aristocracy of trade; and that this bloated caste holds to a party which "blinds the electorate by directing their attention to the privileges and fortunes possessed by owners of land, while it conceals from the people the enormous and increasing advantages which capital is reaping out of labour."

This being the case, what is the obvious game of the Tories? It amazes the Duke of MARLBOROUGH that "they have never thought of carrying the war into the enemy's country." It astonishes him that they have never been cute enough to call popular attention to the masses of wealth in the hands of the trading fraternity (mostly Liberal), "while the working classes are being ground down by long hours of labour, and competition in wages, to the lowest possible limit." However, it is not too late. It can be made perfectly clear that Radical manufacturers and traders, with their vast wealth, "have no more thought for the condition of the wage-earners who produce it than a Southern planter had for the religious welfare of his gang of slaves"; and "the principle that underlies the programme of Tory Democracy" is recognition of this circumstance, together with the facts before recited. "It is easy to say that Tory Democracy is nothing but a system of State Socialism put into practice for the benefit of a party in Parliament"; but never mind that. If it "comes to a question of establishing an odium against property and wealth," the Conservative party ought to see how easy it is to carry the war into the enemy's country, and act accordingly. The operation is simple, but very fascinating. Up with the working-man, and down with "the employer in his luxurious villa." "What is the difference between this man, who trades in the labour-market on competition, and the man who bought a slave in the Charleston market and took him home to work on his plantation on a food-and-lodging subsistence?" That is the way to talk to the people if we wish to cope with the bourgeois Radicals, who are now weakly allowed to overpower us in the constituencies time after time. As for the rest, free education, one free meal a day in the Board Schools, restraint upon free competition in the labour market, and so on, don't you know. Whosoever agrees with the Duke of MARLBOROUGH is a New Tory! Not a firebrand, not a Radical, not a Socialist, not a Radical-Socialist, nor even a Positivist philosopher, but a New Tory!

In turning to the New Trades-Unionism, as described by Mr. HARRISON, his Grace of Blenheim must be struck with the loss of a splendid opportunity. Mr. HARRISON has no doubt that the New Trades-Unionism is an established thing. It is not coming—it has already come into existence. Of course it has yet to take on its full proportions. But grow it will, overshadowing all the land; in which case there is an end of the employer in his luxurious villa, an end of competition in the labour market, and all without the least credit to a converted Conservative party. The old Unionism and Socialism have been fused to create the New Unionism by one man, but that man is neither Lord SALISBURY nor Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL. This must be as wormwood in the Duke of MARLBOROUGH'S cup. But what is the New Trades-Unionism? Mr. HARRISON says that it "may either be described as Socialism putting on the accoutrements of a Trades-Union, or as Unionism suddenly inspired with the passions and aspirations of the Socialists." We agree with him. But is he right in thinking that the New Trades-Unionism is sure to take possession of the whole working population? Is he wise in rejoicing at the prospect with such complacent, such exceeding joy? And though it is true that public opinion was in favour of the strike which is supposed to have originated the new Unionism, though it is equally true that a kindly feeling called Socialistic pervades all classes of society to a degree heretofore unknown, why should he believe that his New Trades-Unionism will come to full growth amidst general delight? Mr. HARRISON'S satisfaction on these points seems to be complete; but surely he runs to doubtful conclusions in too much haste. The sympathy with the dock labourers was truly remarkable; but Mr. HARRISON should remember that it was stimulated by horrible stories of East-End misery repeated over and over again for years before; and, moreover, that the strike was against corporations reported to be enormously rich. Was not that the secret of a sympathy which other strikes of the same year failed altogether to evoke? And does it not account in great measure for the alacrity with which one or two bodies of working-men employed on the Thames threw down their tools to assist the strike? It seems to us that it does. There was no such general sympathy when the Bristol dockers turned out, and no stir of public enthusiasm on behalf of the fifty other strikes that have occurred since. Mr. HARRISON may find himself mistaken, then, in believing that the New Trades-Unionism will rush to complete growth in a continuous blaze of public sympathy. It is all the less likely to do so because it is about to be understood. What its author means the New Trades-Unionism to be, and to do, is already declared. His scheme is out; his plans are known; and what they come to we described from his own mouth a fortnight ago. Every trade and every distinct body of unskilled labourers in the kingdom is to have its Union, and not more than one. Then the Unions are to put themselves in federation. From the committee of each a delegate is to be sent to a Central Council, representing "the solidarity of labour," and wielding the whole of its machinery in the mass. Briefly to describe the functions of the Federal Council, it is to inquire into grievances, to discover oppression, and, if not contented with the rate of wages or the hours of work in this trade or that at any time, it is to bring the whole brotherhood of labour to a dead stand rather than shrink from insisting on redress. That is the New Trades-Unionism which Mr. BURNS is supposed to have created by the fusion of Unionism and Socialism, and which Mr. HARRISON rejoices in as a divine work of unquestionable accomplishment. But a man may be as sane as Mr. HARRISON and yet see in a Trades-Unionism so compacted and administered the promise of a monstrous tyranny—monstrous, ruinous, and absurd. CHRISTOPHER SLY might have invented such a scheme for the governance of his lordship. But we need not labour to show its defects, for the New Trades-Unionism, like the Duke of MARLBOROUGH'S New Toryism, is so new that it has no existence as yet. Possibly Mr. HARRISON'S hopes may be fulfilled in course of time, but we have yet to see the beginnings of a federation which the good sense of the artisan population may decline to have anything to do with; while as for Mr. HARRISON'S obvious belief that the whole community is in love with a Trades-Union Dictatorship that would practically regulate every detail of our lives, he may rely upon it that he is very much in error.

But, since a New Toryism is preached which, when reduced to plain terms, means incitement of the masses to more class hatred and more class robbery; and since there really is a possibility of the New Trades-Unionism flourishing under the patronage of the New Toryism on the one hand and the New Radicalism on the other, Mr. CRACKANTHORPE'S New National Party is indeed a most desirable thing, if its business would be to knock those other novelties on the head. But then, as we understand Mr. CRACKANTHORPE, this new party is to be a union of the Conservative forces of the country with the Conservatism squeezed out; and that is a sort of fusion to which the Tories would object, we fear.

THE PRINCE OF WALES IN EGYPT.

THAT the PRINCE OF WALES'S visit to Egypt should have annoyed the French is a matter of course; and that it should be argued, on the other hand, that it is a thing of no significance at all is hardly less a matter of course. On the former head it is not necessary to say much. That even the condominium enormously exaggerated any real claim that the French had to influence in Egypt is a proposition which we conceive to rest on the amplest historical proof. That, even if it did not, the French had their chance, once for all, when they were invited to join in the putting down of ARABI'S pronunciamiento, and forfeited it, once for all, when they refused, we conceive to be a fact patent to all eyes which do not choose to be blind. As for the significance of the PRINCE'S visit, it is needless to repeat that even an English sovereign has not, theoretically speaking, a very great voice in shaping the policy of the country. It should be equally needless to remark that both a PRINCE who, in the particular circumstances, designed to visit, and Ministers who, in the particular circumstances, consented to his visiting, a country which is situated as Egypt is situated towards England would be guilty of inconceivable blindness if they did not see, or of inconceivable levity if they did not intend to face, the consequences, or at least the constructions, sure to follow.

It is of more importance to reflect, as we may reflect with some not unchequered satisfaction, on those results of seven years' English rule which the PRINCE came to see. There is, indeed, a dark patch across the otherwise sunny field of view, and those who do not consider the old conceptions of NEMESIS either irrational or even pagan may observe a dramatic propriety as well as a useful warning in the coincidence of the news of the collapse of the last remnant of the Equatorial empire of Egypt with the visit of the PRINCE OF WALES to the Egyptian capital. The shadow of defeat fell heavily on Tuesday over the City of Victory. Our own opinion as to the conduct which led to this—conduct as to which no English Ministry since 1882 can be wholly exempted from blame—has been frequently given, and remains unchanged. Yet had Sir EVELYN BARING and his colleagues not a few sheaves to bring with them to show their PRINCE. There is solid occasion for satisfaction, if not for positive boasting, in the change which has come over every department of Egyptian government and life since English influence became practically supreme. No doubt some mistakes have been made; no doubt some efforts have been as yet unsuccessful; least of all is there doubt that the anomalous and intolerable privileges of European nations have been and are a constant stumbling-block. Yet the English agents in Egypt have a record to show for these seven years which is, perhaps, the most emphatic evidence recently supplied that England has not lost the art regere imperio populos, and that in no tyrannical way, and solely for the peoples' good. The finances have been brought from a most unhealthy condition into one which might be called positively healthy if certain foreign influences were not, as they are, exerted to prevent complete convalescence. The state of trade, of commerce, of agriculture is flourishing, instead of being far on the road to ruin. The condition of the people has been marvellously improved, and yields to that of no Oriental and few European peoples. The administration of international justice has become a just administration, except as far as the foreign privileges are concerned, and that of municipal justice is slowly becoming so. The Civil Service—in marked distinction to the time when French influence prevailed in it—has become less and less of a bureaucracy, whose first object was its own comfort and profit. Above all, long, and at one time not too hopeful looking, efforts have made something like a real Egyptian army, with soldiers who can fight, who can be depended upon, and whose service is not looked on in the country as one of the worst lots out of a choice of lots, all miserable. Even the "masterful hand of an Indian Resident," for which Lord DUFFERIN sighed at the beginning of the occupation, could hardly have done more than this; and, though we still hold that the result has not been attained without sacrificing something of duty and much of honour in the outlying provinces, yet, as a result in Egypt itself, it is wholly satisfactory, is a great credit and triumph to those directly concerned in bringing it about, and is a feather in England's cap such as no nation in Europe for many years has earned the right to wear.

WHAT IS A CLUB?

THE old proverb, more forcible than seemly, about the bodiless and soulless state of corporations, is well known. But an institution which can neither be damned nor kicked may yet, it seems, be libelled. And this is, after all, common sense. For certainly it is easier to share a character or reputation among many than to disintegrate or disperse those parts and attributes which are respectively liable to the physical and spiritual penalties already described. A club might perhaps be defined as a congregation of convivial men in which pure food and drink are administered at reasonable prices. But there are many people in clubs who cannot be called clubbable, and some clubs are established for the purpose of gambling. The Daily Telegraph, which never forgets the Queen of SHEBA, has discussed the origin of the Kitcat and the Beefsteak, because the Kingsbridge and South Hams Constitutional Club conceives itself to have been defamed in the Kingsbridge Journal. The case has not yet been tried, so that one must not assume the charges to be either true or false, save in so far as even clubs are entitled to the presumption of innocence. The real question which the Divisional Court has, on demurrer, determined is, that the members or the committee of a club may be entitled to damages if the club is generally libelled. It may be said that this adds a new danger to journalism, and even to familiar correspondence. Suppose a gentleman has the misfortune to be black-balled, and remarks in a note to a friend that he is thankful to have been saved from the odium of associating with a set of contemptible snobs. Who would grudge a rejected candidate this harmless form of consolation? Who can reflect, without a shudder, that the poor man might thus render himself liable to a thousand, or fifteen hundred, actions at law?

The particular action of HOLDSWORTH and others v. BLACKLER is rather complicated. It is not brought against the newspaper in which the alleged libel appeared, but against the writer of a letter, signed "Onlooker," which contained the imputations. Mr. BLACKLER, who acknowledges himself to be "Onlooker," is a member of the Club; and, if he has libelled the whole Club, he is obviously one of his own victims. At present, however, only the Committee have sued him, and they have sued him in a lump. Mr. BLACKLER may be a kind of Devonshire McDUGALL who thinks that people should visit clubs to learn German and drink water. But some of the charges which he makes are explicit enough; and, if they are true, it was right that they should be published. For, according to Mr. BLACKLER, who may or may not be a lay PRICE HUGHES, the Club, not content with cards, billiards, and such profane pastimes, provides "other amusements and allurements to keep young men and married men from their homes until midnight and past." This passage carries with it a tolerably clear innuendo, and we are not surprised that it should have created some excitement among the inhabitants of Kingsbridge. Yet there are arguments and phrases in "Onlooker's" esteemed communication which suggest to the expert in such matters a good deal more than the words convey. Thus it is a "mystery" to him that "the teetotallers are not down on this plague spot." He also hints that, "if it was a club located in one of the small tenements in Dodbrooke, and used by labourers and men who average [sic] about twelve shillings a week," it would have been crushed under the hoof of virtue long ago. After the adventures of Mr. PRICE HUGHES with the Aquarium, perhaps our social reformers may be a little more modest, or at least a little more reticent. If not, the decision of the Queen's Bench is likely to prove timely and opportune. Lord HOUGHTON used to say that all pleasant things were unwholesome, or expensive, or wrong, and that most of them were all three. In these sad circumstances one might be allowed to seek consolation at one's club without being attacked in the local press.

CRETE.

IT is high time that some prominent speaker on the Ministerial side should take in hand the dealings of a certain section of Gladstonians with the subject of Crete, and that not merely, as Mr. GOSCHEN very well did the other day, from the Home Rule point of view. There is a general impression, which, like other general impressions, strengthens itself by meeting with no challenge, that audiences "will not stand foreign politics." To this it can only be answered that Mr. GLADSTONE and his tail had a very different experience thirteen years ago, and that it is the reluctance of speakers to acquire and impart the necessary knowledge, much more than the reluctance of audiences to receive it, which must be blamed. On no subject—not even on Ireland—has the extraordinary tendency to perversion of fact which the Gladstonian party has caught from its leader reached such a pitch as on this. It has been repeatedly pointed out that the very terms of the accusations brought against the Turks of perpetrating "atrocities" in Crete refute themselves, and convict those who have garbled and embroidered them. Every rational person has always been prepared to hear that after a time of civil disturbance, which now and then assumed the full character of an armed insurrection, and when this disturbance had been quelled by the introduction of a large number of foreign and not perfectly disciplined troops, differing in religion from some at least of the natives, a good deal of rough treatment has been experienced by the guiltless as well as the guilty inhabitants. Such things will happen even in far more civilized countries, and the utmost that can be demanded is that they shall be checked as much as possible, and the commission of them, where possible, punished. But between this state of things and one of "atrocities" or of anything at all deserving the tirades of Gladstonian newspapers and the jeremiads of Gladstonian Little Bethels there is the widest possible gulf. It has again and again been pointed out that no evidence of any "atrocities" worthy the name has been given, and that, for the most part, no evidence at all one way or the other was forthcoming.

At last evidence, indubitably trustworthy and tolerably voluminous, is forthcoming, and the reception of it by Gladstonians deserves public attention. It would be impossible to imagine a more careful or a more impartial report than that of Mr. ALFRED BILIOTTI, the English Consul at Canea. Mr. BILIOTTI seems to have taken the utmost pains to obtain information, and has communicated it with perfect freedom. He confirms, as he might have been expected to confirm, the reports of rough treatment of prisoners, of looting and rummaging for money, even of "shooting at sight" here and there. But of real "atrocities," of the outraging of women, of massacres like that of Batak or of Maamtrasna, of torture, or of anything of that kind, he can find not a trace. The very priests in the villages where such acts were said to have been committed had never heard of them, and the husband of an alleged victim was about to take the step—highly practical, but by no means suggestive of a reign of terror—of bringing an action for slander. JANNI This had to carry a heavy stone on his shoulders, and was beaten, or perhaps was not; ZACHARIA That was asked for wine by gendarmes, and thrashed because he did not give it. And so forth. For telling which truths Mr. BILIOTTI is abused for his name by the party of Mr. SCHNADHORST and Mr. JACOBY; pieces of his report are twisted and garbled into such a form as may deceive those who will not be at the trouble to read the original, and a narrative which shows the utter baselessness of the charges and accusations which have been brought is declared "not to impugn" those charges, and to "confirm in substance" those accusations. This kind of political argument seems to go a little beyond a joke. One expects it from the obscure colporteurs of falsehood who drive the Home Rule lie-carts from one village green to another; but that respectable newspapers should countenance or adopt it is not a cheering sign of that progress which makes Mr. GLADSTONE so happy. But, as ever, there is no way of meeting a lie save by patient repetition of the truth. What Mr. BILIOTTI's quite exceptionally candid report comes to is simply this:—The disturbances in Crete have brought rough handling of various kinds on the Cretans; some lives may have been improperly taken by the soldiers, and some property has, no doubt, been destroyed or looted. But there has been no massacre, large or small; there has been only a very small loss of life, and, above all, not a single case of serious outrage on women has yet been substantiated, or brought within measurable distance of substantiation.

PARLIAMENTARY TIMES AND SEASONS.

WE have, if we may borrow a celebrated beginning, a kindness for Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN. It is sometimes our duty to speak rather roughly of him; but it goes against the grain. We would much rather be the bland doctor who exhibits the cakes than the flogging ORBILIUS who administers the cane. Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN has got into bad company; but he is not himself bad. An overweening ambition has led him to become a candidate for the leadership in reversion of the Liberal party, left vacant by the honourable retirement of Lord HARTINGTON and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN; but we do not doubt that at times he is tormented by reflections such as those which disturbed the last moments of SHAKESPEARE'S ENOBARBUS. He is of porcelain, and to see the fragile and delicate vase floating down the stream, jostled by the iron and brazen pots which surround him, is a pathetic spectacle. Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN was not constructed to withstand the collisions which await him, and he is already somewhat flawed and soiled by the shocks which he has undergone. What is fine within him is in danger of growing coarse, to sympathize with Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT and Mr. LABOUCHERE. He is some years older than MACAULAY was when he renounced politics for literature. If Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN could make up his mind that he would be better employed in completing the tale of CHARLES JAMES FOX'S career, which he has left more than half untold, than in abetting the designs of Dr. TANNER and Mr. BIGGAR, English literature might be endowed with a creditable biography. Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN, has, however, chosen his course, and it may not be possible for him to make backward tracks. He cannot be expected to apostatize twice.

It is satisfactory to find that, for the moment, he is harmlessly, and perhaps usefully, engaged. Instead of reconstructing the British Empire, he set himself the humbler task of rearranging the Parliamentary Session. It has occurred to him that it would be a good thing if the House of Commons rose in the beginning of July instead of at some undefined period between August and September, now usually nearer to September than to August. The British legislator has as completely forgotten what rural England is like in the summer as FALSTAFF had forgotten the interior construction of a church. The humble convalescents and the gutter children whom benevolence sends for a week into the country are in this respect more fortunate than peers and members of Parliament. As a means to the great end of getting out of London in July, Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN proposes, as we understand him, that Parliament should meet every year in November. The only objection we can see to this practice, from the Liberal point of view, is that it is a reversion to the unwisdom of our ancestors. The usage prevailed under the wicked Administration of Lord NORTH; and a return to it was suggested, with a sinister purpose more easily suspected than defined, by a still greater offender against sound political doctrines and practices. One of the recommendations of a Select Committee in 1871 was "that it is desirable that Parliament should assemble at a period of the year not later than the last week of November." A reference to the proceedings of the Committee shows that this Resolution was proposed and carried by a majority of one, on the motion of Mr. DISRAELI. The omnipresent reporter had not then, and has not yet, penetrated into the deliberations of Select Committees, and the arguments by which Mr. DISRAELI enforced his proposal are not on record. Tradition whispers, however, that, in reply to the objection that certain members would be unable to attend in November, Mr. DISRAELI deferentially suggested that the House of Commons might be able to get on without them. Sir JOHN PAKINGTON moved, as an amendment to Mr. DISRAELI'S proposition, that Parliament should meet on the earliest convenient day after the 14th of January; but he was defeated by precisely the majority which afterwards carried Mr. DISRAELI'S Resolution.

A formal objection to these Resolutions is that it is the prerogative of the Crown to fix the time at which Parliament shall meet for the despatch of business and that at which it shall be prorogued. The prerogative of the Crown, however, in this matter means the advice of Ministers, interpreting the sense of Parliament, and guided by regard to public convenience. November, it must be admitted, is not an agreeable month in London; but neither is it an agreeable month in any part of the United Kingdom. Peers and members of Parliament are not, of course, confined to the United Kingdom. They are not subject to any writ ne exeat regno; and Italy, Algiers, and Egypt are open to them. Ministers might have difficulty in getting back their majority in full force, and the surprises which are common at the end of the Session in August and September might mark its beginning in November. It may further be doubted whether any mere redistribution of the Session over the months of the year would lead to its better employment. It is as easy to do nothing in November as in February, and the more time a thriftless and loquacious Assembly has, the more it is capable of wasting. A Session beginning in November might find itself languishing towards its decline in August or September, just as if it had begun in February.

On the whole, except that it was the usage under the blackguard PITT, we are inclined to think that Sir JOHN PAKINGTON'S suggestion that Parliament should meet about the middle of January, supplemented by other arrangements which we will proceed to state, would be the best way of rearranging the Session. Though the prorogation of Parliament is one of the prerogatives of the Crown, each of the two Houses can at any time adjourn at its own discretion. If the business of the Session were finished by the beginning of July, a prorogation in the ordinary way would follow. If the work were unfinished, the two Houses might be adjourned to November to complete it. The possibility of having to meet again then would contribute effectually to the prompt despatch of business. Long adjournments, though not common, have been sufficiently frequent to establish a precedent, if an example in the past is necessary before the convenience of the present can be considered. Sir THOMAS ERSKINE MAY gives several instances of them, among the more notable being the adjournment of the House of Commons for nearly three months, in 1785, in order to give the Irish Parliament time to consider the Commercial Propositions, and the still longer adjournment of 1820, while the Pains and Penalties, or, as its illustrious subject used to call it, the Pains and Spinalties, Bill was making its way through the House of Lords. More recent instances are Mr. GLADSTONE'S adjournment of the House of Commons in 1882, over more than two months, from August to October, in order that his Procedure Resolutions might be passed, and be in force from the commencement of the new Session in 1883; and the adjournment last year, from August to November, over nearly three months, to complete the Votes on Supply, a continuance of the Session of which advantage was wisely taken to renew Lord ASHBOURNE'S Land Purchase Act.

The mutations of Parliamentary seasons will follow social changes and fashions. In the time of the STUARTS, as readers of CLARENDON may gather, Parliament met at half-past eight in the morning. After the Revolution the hour was put forward to half-past ten. As bankers and merchants and nabobs (the Bengal Squad) found their way into the House of Commons, the hours which had suited matutinal squires and fox-hunters were found to be inconvenient to men whose days were pledged to the City. Social usages were similarly affected. STEELE, at the beginning of the eighteenth century, complained that the dinner-hour, which in his memory had been twelve, had stolen on to three, and what it would end by being no one could tell. Towards the close of the eighteenth century HORACE WALPOLE held up his hands at the enormity of people dining at six and beginning the evening at ten. When the London season began in October and ended in May, the meeting and prorogation of Parliament hovered about those limits. Fashionable people saw only one thing to regret in the accession of that promising young prince, GEORGE III., and this was the fact that his birthday was on the 4th of June, and that the presence of the Court and Ministers in town might lead to the extension to that date of the Parliamentary Session. As it was in the middle of the eighteenth so it will be towards the end of the nineteenth century. Parliament will not only reflect public opinion, but follow social convenience and usage, which is not, we need scarcely say, the same thing as the usage and convenience alone of that limited portion of the world which calls itself Society.

ARMA VIRUMVE CANEMUS?

MOST people nourish a secret ill-will against people with names substantially the same as their own but differently spelt. Therefore it may well be that, when the case now known as GARDNER v. BYGRAVE first came before Mr. BUSHBY, at Worship Street Police Court, that excellent magistrate determined—consciously or otherwise—so to act as to show that a certain famous head-master of Westminster was no ancestor of his. Whether this speculation is founded in fact or not, Mr. BUSHBY convicted the defendant of assault, at the same time stating a case for the Superior Court in such a way as to raise in all its length and breadth the great question whether or no it is lawful for a schoolmaster to cane a boy on the hand. Mr. Justice MATHEW and Mr. Justice WILLS have decided that such punishment, if inflicted for good cause and with moderation, is lawful. The occasion is further remarkable because the Court made two jokes, one a conspicuous example of all that that greatly-abused phenomenon “judicial humour” ought not to be, the other a shining instance of how the tedium of legal proceedings may be profitably relieved, and the principles of law aptly illustrated, by a really ready and witty observation.

Mr. GARDNER was master of a Board school, and BYGRAVE was a pupil under his sway. BYGRAVE “committed a fault” which properly called for corporal punishment by” his preceptor, “who inflicted the same by giving” the offender “four strokes with the cane upon the hand.” Assuming that caning on the hand could be a proper punishment at all, Mr. BUSHBY held upon the evidence that the caning of BYGRAVE by GARDNER was a good and lawful caning; but he “was also of opinion that punishment by caning on the “hand, however inflicted, was necessarily attended by risk “of serious injury to the hand; that there were methods of “corporal punishment quite as available, efficacious, and “not necessarily attended by any risk, of which methods, “if the appellant [GARDNER] had used due caution, one or “another would have been substituted by him for that “which he adopted; and that for these reasons caning on “the hand was, in the circumstances of the case, improper, “and ought not to have been inflicted.” So Mr. GARDNER was adjudged to be guilty of assault, subject to the case stated for the opinion of the High Court.

Mr. POLAND, not without harrowing references to his own personal history, contended that caning on the hand, soberly and for good cause, was a proper and lawful punishment. Mr. Justice WILLS—and here occurs one of the jokes to which allusion has been made—“hoped we were not “getting too effeminate in these days, or giving too much “encouragement to ill-behaved schoolboys who wanted to “strike.” Mr. ROBSON, who appeared in support of the conviction, was constrained to argue that the lawfulness of caning on the hand depended upon the position and occupation of the offending boy when he was out of school. There was no evidence to show that GARDNER, before caning the hand of BYGRAVE, instituted any inquiry into BYGRAVE'S employment or means of getting a living. It might be that when not in school he worked with his hand, and in that case any injury to it might do him grievous wrong. “Such “a punishment might seriously interfere with his occupation. Punishment might be inflicted elsewhere.” To this Mr. Justice MATHEW retorted with the question “What if his occupation were sedentary?” The Court ultimately held that, while it had not pleased the Legislature to specify those parts of the body which might and those which might not be selected for castigation, it was no part of the common law that blows on the hand with a cane were so dangerous as to make the act of inflicting them unlawful per se, and that as in the case before them the punishment had not been excessive, or actually injurious, but, on the contrary, had been cautiously and humanely administered, Mr. GARDNER had been guilty of no offence, and ought not to have been convicted. They, therefore, quashed the conviction, and gave Mr. GARDNER his costs. This decision will be a great relief to the minds of many persons engaged in the instruction of youth. It is all very well for Mr. BUSHBY to say that there are other “methods” of castigation; but, inasmuch as most schoolmasters nowadays have a well-founded objection to smacking their pupils on the head—which is really dangerous—it would puzzle many people to specify more than one. Caning on the hand is prompt, effective, and not unnecessarily contumelious. There is every reason to be satisfied with the decision that, when done properly and for a proper reason, it is not unlawful.

THE NEW POLITICAL DIFFICULTY.

WE do not know that the Unionist Conference held at Birmingham last Monday, and to be resumed next Monday, is a particularly delightful study for Unionists as such; but it is certainly a very useful study in politics, and one which cannot be too closely conned. Dislike it as we may, the system of groups has made its way into the English Parliament, and it is very doubtful whether it will be easily or soon cast out. Gladstonians have already had their troubles with it in the case of the Laboucharian Irreconcilables or Inconceivables (as they might be better termed), and, in the event of getting their Home Rule way for a time, they would certainly have still worse troubles of the same kind with the Parnellites. But naturally the Conservative-Liberal alliance offers the most abundant instances, and of these the most crucial is at Birmingham. Unless rumour lies very much, it was Conservative apathy, if not something more deliberate still, which worked against Mr. AUSTIN CHAMBERLAIN in the municipal election there last week, and no one has forgotten the perilous and hardly settled disputes at the last Parliamentary contest. At that time we did not hesitate to give our opinion that the Conservatives were wrong, and if it were the case that, either from sulking over the past or from scheming for the future, they have allowed municipal seats to be gained by Gladstonians, their conduct would be still more reprehensible. But this last point is not certain, and in regard to the former it must be remembered that, however reluctantly, they did what the alliance demanded.

We are, however, not much concerned with the questions whether the Conservatives want too much or whether (as those singularly disinterested critics, our Gladstonian friends, unanimously decide) Mr. CHAMBERLAIN gives too little, as questions in themselves. The canvass which Mr. CHAMBERLAIN recommends, if carried out, might supply data for arguing these questions, but at present such data are not easy to get. As it happens, too, they are immaterial to the larger and more important questions concerned. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, as we understand, admits that, arithmetically speaking, the present Liberal-Unionist representation of Birmingham is much above that to which the Liberal-Unionists, as such, are entitled. The Tory leaders, as we understand, admit that (putting the vexed Central Division out of question) they could not by themselves or without Liberal help carry the other six divisions. Here we have two valuable admissions to go upon. Further, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S argument—which is, in effect, an argument for virtual representation—is that, though the Liberal-Unionism of Birmingham may not be entitled to the seats it actually has, the Liberal-Unionism, say of London, is entitled to many more seats than it has, and so you “odd it till it comes even.” This argument is highly plausible. But so is the Tory reply. “That is all very well; but we must show our own hounds game to keep them to the sport, and if we are to be constantly sacrificing ourselves to you, we shall lose our supporters.” “Very true,” rejoins Mr. CHAMBERLAIN; “but, in the same way, if you force Tories on us, our men will fall away to the Gladstonians, and you will find yourself, as you did before, powerless against a reunited and so-called “Liberal party.” And the worst of it is that all these contentions are quite true and valid, and that it is impossible to see any way out of them except by some form of the celebrated HARE plan of a kind of scrutin de liste for the whole country, which has constantly commended itself to philosophers and been scoffed at by practical men. But where you cannot find a way out except by an inaccessible door, the only thing to do is to make yourself as comfortable as possible inside—that is to say, by mutual concession. And the difficulty of adjusting such concessions is one of the main arguments, though there are others, against the subdivision of parties and the creation of groups. Still, as the subdivision of parties with the consequent creation of groups bids fair to be the most prominent feature of politics for some considerable time, it is evident that there will be both more need of and more scope for political management than has been the case for a very long period in England.

SOME SPEECHES OF THE WEEK.

IT is difficult for any one who reads Mr. MORLEY'S speeches at the Newcastle Town Hall and in the Newcastle Liberal Club, with a recollection of his previous day's experiences at the Central Station of that town, to help recalling a locus classicus of Johnsonian table-talk:—“Sir, “it is not done well; but you are surprised to find it done “at all.” Mr. MORLEY himself referred, with a good humour—shall we say a recovered good humour?—which does him infinite credit, to “the course of gymnastics” he had been put through the night before; and it argues a vast amount of what CARLYLE called “cheery stoicism” on his part that he should have found himself able to meet, discourse to, and even make merry with, constituents, who—or an important, and probably a dominant, party among whom—had within the last twenty-four hours given him such a taste of their intolerable quality. Fortunately, however, for Mr. MORLEY, he had not to play the principal part in the proceedings either at the Liberal Club or at the Town Hall. Lord SPENCER, the guest of the Club at luncheon, was also the chief speaker at the evening meeting, and among other matters with which he dealt on the latter occasion was one which it were to be wished, for the sake of his reputation, that he had let alone. In the miserable position into which Mr. GLADSTONE has dragged them, the conduct of the few men of character, and once of moral weight and authority, who still consent to follow him is constantly presenting us with a very painful problem. They are always selected, or select themselves—for the uncertainty on this point is part of the problem—to assail the policy of the Government at points where such attack is least creditable to any man of Ministerial position and past experience of Ministerial responsibility who condescends to make it. And we are continually invited to wonder whether they volunteer for or are pressed into this service because it is imagined by themselves or held by their leader that it is their duty to lend such semblance of respectability as may be possible to the ignoble work, or whether they are actually attracted to such subjects by one of those perverted instincts which generally accompany demoralization of any kind, whether political or other.

Lord SPENCER'S reference to the Gweedore murder and the Maryborough trials supplies as melancholy an example of this unpleasant problem as we can for the moment recall. “The Government,” he said, “were bound to prosecute; but they were bound to do it with forbearance and justice. If the crowd, who acted like howling madmen when they made the attack on the policemen, were “excited, it was no business of the Government to be “excited.” That is to say, it is a mark of “excitement” on the part of an Executive to direct that a man who has deliberately brought about a riot from which a murder has resulted shall be proceeded against—in the first instance, at any rate—upon an assumption of his prima facie responsibility for the gravest of the consequences ensuing from his act. “The Government,” continued Lord SPENCER, “charged Father M'FADDEN with murder; but he was “released eventually on merely pleading guilty to the “technical charge of obstructing the police, which he never “denied. They withdrew practically every charge against “him, and he (Lord SPENCER) could not help thinking that “a greater act of injustice and unfairness to a free subject “of the QUEEN had hardly ever been put before the public.” Perhaps the relatives, friends, and comrades of the murdered police-officer may not take Lord SPENCER'S easy-going view of a “technical” offence, which practically led directly to that unfortunate man being beaten and stoned to death; and, if they are not very greatly impressed by the “injustice” and “unfairness” shown to a priest who returns home absolutely scathless in respect of a murder which will for ever lie, where the battered corpse of the victim lay, at his door, we entertain no doubt whatever that their feelings are shared by every healthy mind uncorrupted by the virus of partisanship in the United Kingdom.

As to Lord SPENCER'S animadversions on the constitution of the Maryborough juries, he is to be sincerely compassionate on not having apparently seen the Times of the day in which he spoke. Had he done so he would have come across a letter which put Mr. MORLEY'S previous strictures on this point in so ridiculous a light that Lord SPENCER, we suspect, would have been disposed to steer clear of the subject. Really, now that it is known to a public who have hitherto been very ill-informed on the matter that at the first of the two trials the defence challenged twenty jurors against twenty-two challenged by the Crown; that at the second trial the numbers on each side were respectively twenty and twenty-four—of which latter number four were Protestants, whereas in no case did the defence ever challenge a Catholic—when these facts, we say, have been made known, it argues a little too audacious presumption upon popular stupidity for Gladstonian orators to persevere with the parrot cry against jury-packing. In saying that Lord SPENCER must have missed the correspondent's letter in question, we are sorry only to mean that, if he had seen it, he might have doubted whether the public could be any longer misled on the matter in question. We cannot, unfortunately, suppose that the information contained in it was required to remove any illusions of his own. Lord SPENCER'S Viceregal experience has made him perfectly familiar with the whole practice of criminal prosecution in Ireland, and he knows as well as any one what is the real value of the Parnellite rubbish about jury-packing. When, therefore, we read these latest utterances of his at Newcastle, we find ourselves more than ever oppressed by the painful question, whether such speeches are to be regarded as part of the corvée of a wretched political servitude, or as the spontaneous suggestions of a profound political demoralization. The empty rhetoric of which Mr. MORLEY, in professed reply to the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, delivered himself on the following evening at Middlesborough, finds its simplest and most effective answer in the plain facts of the contest now waging on the PONSONBY estate. Here we have, on the one hand, a body of tenants holding under a landlord whose liberality—nay, whose “exalted, honourable, “and generous conduct”—they have themselves at a former day admitted, and whose rents since that day have never been raised; and, on the other hand, a knot of agitators, presided over by a political agitator who knows absolutely nothing of the estate and its circumstances, and inspired by a priest who knows enough of these circumstances to convict him of wilful and deliberate falsehood in asserting that, "in the memory of living witnesses and far beyond it, the tenants in question have been notoriously rack-rented and oppressed." This crew of mischief-makers have thrust themselves between the PONSONBY tenants and their landlord, opposing and thwarting every reasonable effort at a settlement, until now, when every penny of rent has for four years been withheld, it has at last become imperatively necessary to strike at the fraudulent conspiracy in the only way which is unfortunately possible—namely, by eviction process issued against its dupes. Or, if this were not a sufficient answer to Mr. MORLEY, it would be easy to supplement it by extending the survey to another Irish county, and noting what has passed between Mr. SMITH-BARRY and the aggressive combination which he, too, is so stoutly combating. Here the evidence of gratuitous and tyrannical interference on the part of the agitators is even more convincing than in the other case; and we find a tenant actually writing to his landlord to express his regret that he has been unable, although he is personally opposed to withholding his rent, to resist the coercive pressure brought to bear upon him to compel him to that course. And, while things like this are happening in Ireland, Mr. MORLEY can get up at Middlesborough and exclaim, "Depend upon it we are fighting the old battle of oppression on one side and freedom on the other." So in one sense they are—Mr. MORLEY and his "campaigning" friends in Ireland. But if he really wishes to know on which side "the oppression" is, and on which the freedom, we recommend him to put himself at once into communication with Mr. WILLIAM EATON, Protestant tenant on the estate of Mr. SMITH-BARRY. "Right and wrong," continued the unconsciously suicidal orator, "are in the nature of things—laws of right and wrong are graven on the tables of experience and history." Yes, right and wrong are in the nature of things; and they have no relation to the sophistical standards set up by a man who seems destined to prove to the world that "the best things turn to the worst" is an adage which nowhere justifies itself with more terrible force than in relation to the debasement of the philosophical moralist turned party politician. And, if one lesson is graven more deeply than another on the "tables of experience and history," it is that there can be no worse enemies of a people than those who undertake to lead them to the attainment of their material interests by the path of fraud and violence.

BICYCLES v. CAVALRY.

A VOLUNTEER on a bicycle is a patriotic and imposing spectacle, and no doubt in actual service he can go very fast, far, and silently. The advantages of a bicycle when you wish to establish an alibi have presented themselves to the mind of M. FORTUNÉ DU BOISGOBEY long ago, and lately to the fancy of an English novelist. Now, if ever any men could have a natural and justifiable desire to be elsewhere, these men are bicycling warriors swooped upon by hostile cavalry in a hollow, with steep rising ground in front and rear. What, in these distressing circumstances, are the bicyclists to do? To leap from their machines and run away over walls appears to be about the most obvious strategic movement. But Professor COOK WILSON, a pundit in moral philosophy, and a lieutenant of Volunteers, has invented a dodge which has been depicted in the Illustrated London News. The gallant bicyclists form square, turn their machines upside down, lie down behind them, aim at the doomed foe, and—set the wheels of the bicycles whirling. Next to meeting "a waggon-load of monkeys with their tails burned off" (an improbable adventure), there is nothing a cavalry charger dislikes more than being expected to charge a zariba of bicycles with the wheels twirling. "Ware wire" is what he says to himself at present; though it may be different when the cavalry of our foes has been trained to say "Ha, ha!" and jump a lively bicycle hedge. Meanwhile, of course, he is being potted at by the Volunteers on the other side of the wires; and there are the bayonets to be reckoned with, and the bugler, who is a very determined-looking person in a Merton ribbon. Professor COOK WILSON's zariba is a good zariba; but has he asked himself what becomes of the lamps when the bicycles are turned upside down? Surely the foolish bicyclists will be like the foolish virgins, and their oil will be spilt. Or are the lamps constructed with such ingenuity that they can stand being turned upside down without spilling? On the whole, we fancy it will be better to invent some way of turning a bicycle into a stronghold without turning it upside down. It seems to be taken for granted that the enemy will not land a force of bicyclists; but why not? Bicycles are far more easily transported than horses; bicycles eat nothing, bicycles do not stampede, and have no nerves. The first skirmish in which bicyclists meet bicyclists will be a glorious opportunity for the artist. A sabre drill should be devised on purpose for them, as we presume that a regiment of bicyclist lancers would be sorely cumbered with their spears, unless, indeed, these are accommodated with joints, like fishing-rods. A charge of bicycling lancers, however, if it could be arranged, would certainly "give tone to what might otherwise degenerate into a vulgar brawl." It is probable that feats of fancy bicycling may horrify horses when the Oxford men meet hostile cavalry. The horse hates the bicycle almost as much as he dislikes the camel of the desert. On the whole, it seems that Professor COOK WILSON is in the right course or track, and his services to Oxford Volunteering have been most energetic and praiseworthy. The only obvious weak point, to a civilian mind, is that business of the lamps—which, after all, perhaps the ingenious inventor can deal with by some plan of his own—and the possibility of entanglements dire in the case of a sudden order to reverse bicycles and retreat.

THE CHRYSANTHEMUM CENTENARY.

FOR some weeks past the floral world has been moved to the depths to celebrate the centenary of the chrysanthemum in Europe. Exhibitions have been held throughout the country amid general enthusiasm. The horticultural press has put forth its "Chrysanthemum numbers," and has overbrimmed with technical and historical articles on the subject. This week the observance culminates in the Conference and exhibition at Chiswick, the Crystal Palace Show, and the popular annual display in the Temple. What does it matter if, as Mr. CARRUTHERS points out, the centenary is celebrated twenty-five years after date? The rich results of culture are the richer for the delay. The enthusiast of 1764 may well have deemed those first specimens grown in the garden of the Apothecaries' Company at Chelsea "almost too august and high for adoration," as LANDOR's epigram on LUCREZIA BORGIA's hair has it; and now they are "dust," or on the way to dissolution, the "pellucid gold" of the "golden flower" has acquired a splendour of sheen and colour that shames the pale original. The first forms of the Chinese flower introduced in 1763, and preserved in the herbarium of the Natural History Department, the first specimen pictured in the Botanical Magazine, give themes on which the least successful cultivator might moralize; though the beauty and fragrance of these once held everybody by their freshness and charm. The elegance and ineffable distinction of the flower are qualities of unknown antiquity. The exquisite aroma that exhales from stems, foliage, buds, and flowers is a primal inalienable virtue. The rose-raiser has succeeded in evolving roses that are the reverse of "royal in their scent alone," roses robbed of odour, their highest natural gift; but no ingenious person has yet succeeded in evolving a scentless chrysanthemum. But in form and colour and magnitude culture has worked miracles. Looking round the wonderful gathering at Chiswick, the cultivator and lover of flowers may well murmur, "Better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay," though perhaps the culture of the "flowery land" was ill represented by the first importations to Europe. Mr. HARMAN PAYNE estimates the period of Chinese cultivation at more than two thousand years, yet European culture, in the course of a little more than a century, has surpassed the most fantastic visions of Japanese designers. The very name of the flower has become curiously inexact. There are other golden flowers, much less subject to variation; and the name was never truly significant, as are the names that perpetuate some fixed or notable character, or those, like Bougainvillea, Tradescantia, Dahlia, and Linnaea, that enshrine the memory of botanists. The old gold that suggested the name was, curiously enough, akin to sulphur, or chrome, or Naples yellow. Now these hues are blended in infinite gradations of tone with bronzy tints and reds and maroon; yet, for all its exuberance of development, it possesses gold in abundance, sheeny, or dull, or dusted like the auricula.

Well is it that the chrysanthemum fosters eclecticism in its admirers. The passionate pilgrim to Chiswick or the Crystal Palace would be hard put to name his love among the seven hundred varieties and the diverse forms of the flower. Happily, its habit, style, and form know no violence or excess. No flower is its superior in decorative value. It is never "loud," and it does not flaunt. It may be flamboyant, globular, starry, cupped, incurved, recurved, generous-eyed, or compact as a ball; it may ape a wild disorder, as of the locks of some fierce manad or the tentacles of a zoophyte, or be as demurely prim as any autumnal aster; and withal it is ever of noble behaviour, refined, decorous, elegant, fascinating. Its native elegance is a good deal impaired at times when treated for exhibition purposes, when some eight feet of stem, surmounted by a single prodigious flower, rise from a pot of ludicrous dimensions, with the curious effect of a head impaled on a pike. Assiduous tending and generous feeding throughout the summer have produced this wonder of bulk and circumference, yet if you are not a raiser of florist's flowers, you wonder rather less at the result than at the pains expended. The chrysanthemum has a lovely way of languor, drooping or waving in luxuriant manner, when grown in favourable circumstances, not for competitive shows. To see a goodly company in the open air under some protecting wall in an ancient garden is a sight to warm the waning autumn sun to fresh ardour. Despite its reputed hardness, the chrysanthemum can seldom be seen at its best in gardens. Those gigantic plants depicted by Mr. DU MAURIER in Punch, which are "not bad—for the time of year," could never have grown but in some Hesperian garden, with a foamless sea hard by. Some varieties, the pomponé kinds especially, will make a brave show in many parts of England, but all alike detest the buffetings of the autumnal storms, and the ruinous rains that often precede sharp frosts. There are, it is true, the summer-blooming kinds, though they have scarcely achieved popularity; but, with all possible care on the part of the open-air grower, the glories of Chiswick are altogether beyond his attainment.

MORE STRIKES.

THE draw in favour of the dock-labourers which ended the "great strike" has plainly established a conviction in the minds of workmen that they have only to strike and they must obtain whatever they please. Accordingly the papers are again full of strikes and rumours of strikes, in London and out of it. The bakers are to strike to-day week unless their demands are conceded, the lightermen have struck already, while there is a dropping fire of reports of strikes in the provinces. In short, an attempt is being made to raise wages all over the country. The effort is a very natural one. There is at no time anything immoral in it, and, when the men have calculated correctly, and have struck on a rising market, they are thoroughly well entitled to whatever they can get. When they judge unwisely, and strike at the wrong time, they must smart for it; but they are not more iniquitous, and we doubt whether they are more mischievous, than the persons who perform costly antics in copper markets and cotton rings. We make these not very original remarks merely as a precaution against those emotional friends of ours who think that whenever you doubt the wisdom of a strike, you are denying the right of the downtrodden son of toil to better himself. By all means let him better himself; but we doubt whether he is going the right way to work to do it in some cases.

The lightermen's strike, which is now in full swing, is the most conspicuous of these movements for the time being, and is for other reasons particularly deserving of attention. It happens to illustrate in a remarkable way the consequences of treating business as sentiment, and not as business. The men, it is known, first struck out of sympathy with the dock-labourers, and then continued out on strike from sympathy with themselves. When at last they were persuaded to go back, and to allow the dockers to go back, they consented to accept Lord BRASSEY as arbitrator between them and their employers. Lord BRASSEY was to decide their differences as to wages, on which point the masters had indicated their readiness to make concessions, and also their differences as to terms of night-work, on which point the masters would not yield. As might have been expected, Lord BRASSEY made the formal award of wages, and then, like a sensible man, observed that the masters and lightermen had better settle the terms of night-work between them; in short, he confessed ingenuously that his arbitration, like most others, was a mere futility. The quarrel has accordingly broken out afresh, and the lightermen went on strike on Monday—the day from which the rise of pay for the docker was to begin. So far the strike has shown the folly of interference of third parties in family quarrels. The lesson, however, has been lost on the old Committee of conciliation, which is again at work at the Mansion House showing its heartfelt sympathy for B by asking for money from A. Another fact about the strike, which is not without interest, is this, that the lightermen are a chartered body with a monopoly. They can stop much of the work on the river, and are prepared to do it. How that conduct differs from the common selfishness of the ordinary employer we have yet to learn. It may be necessary to inquire shortly whether the charter has not been forfeited. In the meantime it appears—and this is a second point which the sympathizers with all strikes may take into consideration—that the dockers for whom the lightermen struck are being persuaded to strike for their friends in turn. The trades are to establish a cross-ruff, at the expense of the employer and the consumer who are the other partners in the game. For, after all, the cost of this sort of play falls sooner or later on the consumer—and that is the most important of all the points the Committee of conciliation and onlookers of all kinds may take into their consideration.

It has already been borne in upon the minds of some sympathizers with the workmen in the County Council that since the rise of wages in the docks there has been a corresponding rise of 6*d.* per ton in the price of the coal brought up the Thames. This was, of course, inevitable. It is the nature of business that an increase in the cost of working any branch of it is soon felt in an increase in the cost of products. The working class will suffer by this as well as other people. Moreover, when the consequence of the rise in prices is followed out, it is seen to be very likely to lead to results of a far from pleasant character for London workmen. The port has some difficulty in making head against its many competitors as it is. If the conduct of business is made more costly and more difficult, trade will go very rapidly away from it. This may, as some profess to believe, be for the general good of the country; but what will the effect of it be on the dockers, stevedores, and lightermen themselves? The question is one which their sympathizers might put to them, instead of merely prophesying smooth things and encouraging them in delusions.

A BAD BUSINESS.

THE Coroner's jury have found a verdict to the effect that the late Mr. ERNEST WELDON died from exhaustion, though there was not sufficient evidence to show that he had the specific diseases mentioned in the medical certificate as the cause of death. As the certificate was signed by one doctor and filled up by another, the signature being the earlier process of the two, the uncertainty of the inference and the doubts of the jury are not altogether wonderful. The proceedings described in the Coroner's court are more remarkable than satisfactory, and it is to be hoped that they are not likely to recur. The ends of justice have not in this instance suffered, because it has been conclusively proved that no one contributed to Mr. WELDON's sudden and early departure from this world except himself. There was not, indeed, the faintest shadow of excuse for the cruel suspicions against Mrs. ERNEST WELDON, which had their appropriate origin in the worst type of American journalism. The attempt to make another MAYBRICK case out of this unhappy young man's only too intelligible fate was a most miserable and disgraceful enterprise. The plain truth is that Mr. WELDON drank himself into his grave. "I have been going it," he said when he sent for the doctor; and he knew perfectly well what was the matter with him. There was no earthly reason why the public should have known anything whatever about it. When an unfortunate man destroys his health, his reason, and his life by dismal and besotted folly, the feelings of his relatives need surely not be sacrificed to a curiosity which is first morbid and secondly idiotic. But with a certain class of newspaper nothing is too high or too low for copy. There are some purveyors of what the poverty of the English language compels us to call news, who make so much out of a "mystery" that they will make a mystery out of anything. "Only twenty-nine? How strange! Wife married before? Startling coincidence. Very few people at the funeral? This must be looked into." So we have a long story, or rather a long series of long sentences, in which hardly a single fact can be found, but which produces upon the mind of a hasty reader a vague impression that there has been murder, and that it is, somehow, a family affair.

Some said the Prince Bishop had run a man through,
Others said an assassin had killed the Prince Bishop.

Mr. WELDON died on the 8th of September, and it became necessary to bury him at once. About a fortnight afterwards people began to talk, or rather to write, and by order of the HOME SECRETARY the body was exhumed. Perhaps it is as well that Mr. MATTHEWS granted the permission, though there was really no particular reason for it. When accusations of murder are made or insinuated, it is only right that all doubt should be removed. Dr. STEVENSON, the well-known Analyst to the Home Office, employed every available test to discover the existence of poison in the remains, and found, as might have been anticipated, that there was nothing of the sort. It would be useless and unpleasant to describe the condition in which Mr. WELDON was found by his doctor four days before his death. One need not be a medical expert to see by a glance at the symptoms that the patient was in a very advanced stage of alcoholic decline. He said himself that he had begun drinking when he was a boy at Marlborough, and that he had been drinking steadily ever since. It has been suggested with sublime absurdity that this fact is disparaging to the reputation of our public schools. As Mr. WELDON was a resident of South Kensington at the time of his fatal seizure, that interesting and intellectual district must expect to be accused of fostering an appetite for stimulants. If one boy drank in secret at Marlborough fifteen years ago, the present Head-Master must, it seems, be called upon to defend the existing morality of his school. It is as difficult to prevent some boys from drinking as to stop some fools from raving. But that tipping is a common vice in the public schools of this country all experience emphatically contradicts. The evidence of Dr. FARR and of his brother, Mr. JAMES FARR, is much more germane to the matter than the former discipline of Marlborough. It is, as the Coroner said, worth the attention of the Registrar-General. If the certificate had been duly written and signed by the same doctor, it is possible that this wretched story might never have been published. As it was, the Coroner had to interpose, and prevent counsel from going into domestic disputes. There has seldom been a more unwholesome instance of the wish to believe evil, and to dwell upon nauseous details. A man's mind must indeed be empty, swept, and garnished before he wants to know the contents of a deceased drunkard's intestines.

SIR HENRY PARKES'S LETTER.

THE letter which the Premier of New South Wales has addressed to his colleagues in the Australasian colonies has been understood to be the beginning of a serious attempt to organize a Federation of Australia. It is to be taken for granted that Sir HENRY PARKES wrote it with this intention; but whether it will have this effect is at least doubtful. We have yet to see what reception will be given to his proposal by the other colonies, and then whether agreement among them is possible if they do meet in the Conference he desires to see held. At present it looks not improbable that, so far from forwarding Federation, Sir HENRY PARKES may only have stopped a comparatively easy step towards a final Federation by threatening to drown it in the discussion of measures which may prove by no means easy of accomplishment. His letter is an answer to an invitation from Victoria to help in the establishment of some form of common administration for the defences of the colonies. This Sir HENRY PARKES declines to do, on the ground that organization of the defences must needs be part of a general federal organization, and he insists that the lesser question must be dealt with as part of the greater. Now, whatever appearance of cogency there may be about his contention, it may very well turn out in practice that, if the Australian colonies are called upon to discuss the points on which their interests differ, they may lose sight of that on which they agree, and Federation may be found to be further off than ever.

The reasons which Sir HENRY PARKES gives for declining to join with Victoria in organizing the defences of the colonies appear to us to be just those which would commend themselves to a man who was casting about for a plausible excuse for forcing on a scheme of his own. He justifies his refusal, first, by the alleged want of authority in the colonial Governments to establish a common army, and then by the want of any common authority to command it. As Sir HENRY PARKES acknowledges that the Federal Council Act especially authorizes the colonies to act together for their "general defences," we do not quite understand why authority should be supposed to be wanting. Sir HENRY is made to doubt because the "general defences" are included in a long list of secondary matters, and he does not think it possible that the power to do so considerable a thing as form an army should be conferred in so casual a manner. The want of a common authority to control the army is for the moment obvious enough, but the Federal Council Act provides the means of establishing one. If the colonies choose to establish a Council and limit it to the management of the defences, no opposition to their wish would be offered by the Imperial Government. A politician who was really anxious to forward the formation of a Federation might very well consent to this tentative step, even if he were sure that it would be found unsatisfactory on trial. If the desire for closer union is really strong in Australia, it would be strengthened by the discovery that half-measures were of no avail. On the other hand, the desire must be powerful, indeed, if it proves strong enough to overcome the many obstacles to Federation which must needs come to the front in any such Conference as Sir HENRY PARKES wishes to see held. The respective fiscal policies of New South Wales and Victoria would alone constitute a difficulty of the most serious kind. New South Wales has adhered to Free-trade, and will hardly be disposed to accept the Victorian tariff in return for what market Victoria can offer it. Victoria is even less likely to surrender its tariff in return for the commercial nothing at all which New South Wales can offer. What could New South Wales give if Free-trade is adopted, except that liberty to compete with the products of the mother-country which Victoria possesses already. There are other and minor, but not insignificant, difficulties which will have to be overcome before Federation can be established in Australia, the claims of Sydney and Melbourne to be capital being one of them. It may also very well be found that, if the Conference does meet, the position of Western Australia may lead to difficulties with the mother-country. On the whole, therefore, it is at best doubtful whether Sir HENRY PARKES's letter will prove the beginning of a serious attempt to establish Federation in Australia. The effort, if made, will be sure of sympathy in England. The colonies are welcome to do whatever they think is for their interest, and we can only hope that it will be found to agree with our own.

GERMANY AND THE PORTE.

EVEN after the numerous visits which have recently been paid by the German EMPEROR, it might have been expected that his pilgrimage to Constantinople would not lack comment; and, on the whole, the comment has been moderate and reasonable enough. If Germany were supposed to be in close alliance with all the countries to which her active young EMPEROR takes it into his head to journey, France would find herself left against a world in arms; or perhaps the EMPEROR's passion for travel might even lead him to France herself. As a matter of fact, the relations between Berlin and Constantinople need be nothing but friendly, for the very reason that they have always been rather distant. There is, no doubt, a good deal of soreness in the Turkish mind as to the conduct of friends who were once very close friends indeed; and it has been frequently admitted here that the Turks have a good deal to say for themselves. If they are to lose provinces, to be lectured and interfered with, to be regarded as a sort of standing dish for Europe to cut and come again at whenever there is a fancy to carve out some newfangled principality, they would, naturally enough, as soon have these operations performed by open enemies as by very obliging friends. These are almost the words attributed to the SULTAN himself in a recent conversation. They are very natural words; and it is equally natural that the Turks should not care to consider too carefully how difficult they have made the task of helping them, and how easy that of relieving them of their goods.

Germany, at least, has a clear record as regards Turkey; and, if she has never done anything for the Porte, she is all the more free from unpleasant memories of transactions in which for a century and more the Turk has, somehow or other, invariably come off the loser, and the Christian, whether foe or friend, the winner. It is extremely improbable that any serious idea of inducing Turkey to enter the Triple Alliance was entertained; and it would be very difficult to say on which side such an arrangement would be most risky. That the Turks can produce excellent soldiery a well-educated young man like the Emperor WILLIAM must have known before the fact was exposed to his actual eyesight. But, dismembered, mangled, encroached upon, and drained of money as Turkey has been, her alliance would be of little offensive service to any one, while it would oblige her allies to that very entanglement with Eastern affairs which it has been the special object of German policy to keep out. On the other hand, such an alliance would be for Turkey a direct challenge to Russia, and would be regarded as a hostile act by France, who, though she has never done much good to Turkey, during the last thirty years at least, and has disobliged the Porte in the matter of Tunis, is still by way of being a kind of friend. Such assistance as Turkey can give—which must be chiefly in the way of distracting a part of the enemy's forces—would arise more naturally out of the circumstances of war, when war comes, than out of an alliance which might provoke war. Nor in other matters need the visit have much effect politically. The desire of the Porte to recognize Prince FERDINAND is a very sensible desire, and will probably take effect some day; but, so long as the Great Powers do not wish openly to break with Russia on the subject of her disgraceful refusal to perform the duty of a trustee, such a recognition could do no good, and might precipitate harm. Indeed, so generally have these considerations been recognized as valid, that the rumour about the engagement of Princess MARGARET of Prussia to the CZAREWITCH may be regarded as in part an attempt to start a new hare when it was found that no more running could be got out of the old. The rumour and its contradictions may be shortly dismissed, and the commotion which they have excited in Austria was both unreasonable and unhealthy. The Austrians might have comforted themselves by remembering that marriage-bells cannot break the laws of nature, and that the laws of nature have made it impossible for Germany and Russia to be real friends.

THE MARITIME CONFERENCE.

WE confess to a difficulty, which, for the rest, is probably shared by all who consider its proceedings, in deciding whether anything, or, if anything, what, can come out of the Maritime Conference now in progress in America. The English delegates have been instructed to keep the discussions within narrow bounds. They have been ordered to confine themselves to the rules of the road and to lights and sound-signals. It is obvious that a maritime Conference would be amazingly fond of discussion for its own sake if it persisted in talking about subjects which the English representatives refused to consider. The other members have, therefore, somewhat unwillingly, as we gather, confined themselves to this reference. Even within these limits they have, however, been unable to effect much of a definite kind as yet. To be sure, this is largely due to the good sense of the delegates. If they had accepted one of the suggestions made to them, the Conference would have distinguished itself by giving currency to nearly the most dangerous innovation which could well be made in the accepted rules of the road. Some of the delegates, headed by the German Captain MENSING, proposed to record the approval of the Conference to a declaration that it is not necessary to slacken speed in a fog. It is very characteristic that the Germans, the last comers among maritime peoples, should be so audacious. Not so many years ago some of their ships undertook to show the Channel Squadron that it was safe, if you were only smart enough, to manœuvre with your ships at half a cable's length from one another. The result of that lesson of theirs was the sudden disappearance of the Great Elector. It is quite consistent with their youthful enthusiasm that they should be the partisans of the very plausible paradox that great speed in a fog is safe, because the quicker you go, the more easily can you alter your course. When you can see ahead, and the officer on the bridge is a man of steady nerve and sound judgment, speed may be safe in crowded waters, though, even then, moderation is safer. But in a fog, when it is often impossible to see the vessel's length ahead, great speed is simply criminal. The most moderate dose of common sense will enable anyone to understand that, when a very short distance has to be covered, to avoid a collision, the longer a ship is in covering it, the better will be her chance of avoiding a smash. Moreover, slow speed makes it easier to stop altogether; and there are times when stopping altogether is the only safe resource in a fog. This smart-looking belief in high speed is, no doubt, not unpopular among English skippers, who are in the habit of justifying it by saying that owners and passengers like quick passages. So they may, but rules of the road are not made for owners, and passengers ought to have no voice in the matter.

The more modest suggestions which have been made to the Conference generally take the form of additions to the lights already used. Some of the delegates recommend side lights aft as well as forward, and others complain that sailing ships do not show lights enough to warn a steamer which may be overtaking them. On the whole, these proposals seem to be inspired by the belief that, if signals enough are made and lights shown in abundance, they must be seen. Unfortunately the records of collisions are there to show that disasters happen because lights which ought to be shown are not shown, or because lights which ought to be seen are not seen. These causes of collision would not be removed by the mere multiplication or alteration of lights. Exactly the same may be said, with the necessary changes of words, of fog signals. Neither does it appear at all probable that the third cause of collisions, which is error of judgment, would be diminished, still less removed, by making the lights and signals already used other or more complicated than they are. Nobody has yet proved that, when lights are properly shown, signals properly sounded, and a proper look-out kept, it is not quite possible for ships to see or hear and avoid one another. Until that is done, we fail to see the justification for changes which must begin by causing confusion. It is, however, happily apparent that this is the opinion of most of the delegates, for they have been very cautious in accepting innovations.

THE END OF THE EXHIBITION.

THE French Exhibition has ended appropriately enough in a very large, very successful, and very good-tempered gaudy. Singing men and women sang into the phonograph on the Eiffel Tower, and thereby secured themselves a kind of immortality. All Paris and some foreign parts swarmed into the building on the absolutely last occasion on which it was to be opened. Lions and lionesses flowed softly about in crowds. But the spectacle has been sung by the Times' Correspondent, who was there, and to whom it brought a fit of poetic enthusiasm, in which he compared it all to a "Parisian 'return from the Derby,' minus the donkey-carts." The French may be excused—or rather need no excuse at all—if they have felt jubilant at the success of their Exhibition. It has been a very successful thing of its kind, and admirably well managed. No hitch of any kind has occurred in it from first to last. Instruction and amusement have been mingled with the greatest tact. Those people who rejoice in looking at heaps of heterogeneous articles from all parts of the world have never had such a feast provided for them. If the French really did require to prove to themselves for their own peace of mind that they can still attract crowds of visitors to Paris and can manage a big show, they have done it thoroughly well.

The extraordinary thing (and yet to those who know their Frenchmen it is not so extraordinary) is that they have felt the need of making this demonstration. That curious corruption of modesty which takes the form of vanity (corruptio optimi pessima, you know) has given the French agonies of pain during the last few years, and they have at last been driven to do something conspicuous just to show themselves and the world that they are alive. To take this for granted and let the world wag as it pleases is not the nature of Frenchmen, and that is why they are such a brisk element in Europe. For the rest, their activity has been known to take worse forms. Just now, until the blue devils get hold of them again, they are pleased with themselves and the impression they have produced. Some of them are even convinced that Englishmen and other foreigners, but particularly Englishmen, must now see that the French are good for something. It must, one would think, be very painful to belong to a nation which is in such a perpetual fidget about its neighbours' opinion. One might as well be a Bostonian. Another fact about the Exhibition, and one that would be extraordinary, indeed, if the French were anything but French, is, that it has had a most undoubted influence on the stability of their Government. It would be rash, indeed, to assert that the Third Republic is safe; but certainly it is safer than it was six months ago, and far safer than it would have been if the Bazaar had been a less undoubted success. On that point the French are themselves the best authority. They assert that it is so, and may be believed. When the Exhibition was first planned it was generally remarked what a sad thing it would be if it were interrupted, and so there was a general agreement not to interrupt it. The desire to figure in it stiffened the backbone of the Republicans, and the fear that he might have to bear the blame of disturbing it helped, with other fears, to hamper the Brave who sits at Jersey in the seat of VICTOR HUGO. Really it may therefore be safely said that this big version of BARNUM'S Circus did for France what its political faculty would never have done. If this sounds a flippant and impertinent remark, let the French bear the blame themselves. They say that they have been so influenced, and it is hard to believe that any people would make such a ridiculous confession in mere wantonness. How long the influence of the Exhibition will last is another question. People cannot live on the Eiffel Tower alone or go on listening to M. MELCHISEDEC out of a phonograph for ever. But the truth as to this will appear in time. For the present, it is enough to note the fact, equally veracious and amazing, that the rarest of raree shows has done for the Third Republic nearly or quite as much as could be done for it by victory over foreign foes, and more than could be done for it by good finance and statesmanlike administration at home. What a wonderful people!

MR. SMITH AT GLASGOW.

IF Mr. SMITH, as he told his hearers at Glasgow the other night, has never before addressed a Scotch audience, he has made a good beginning. His speech from first to last was of a kind which, supposing there to be anything in accepted theories of the national temperament, ought to be most effective with a Scottish audience; while its concluding portion—if we except the unlucky reference to the “English flag,” a slip the more remarkable because “British” is a word which comes more naturally to the lips in connexion with “flag” than almost any other word in the language—was eminently calculated to give satisfaction in Scotland. The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY has promised to proceed further with Scotch business next Session, and he made special disclosure of the intention of the Government to appoint a “small Commission of practical men” to examine Lord LOTHIAN'S proposals for the development of the resources of the Western Highlands and the Hebrides. The announcement will be welcome elsewhere than in Scotland, and the initiation of the measures to which it refers will deserve to be watched with interest by Englishmen. No better occasion could be given for testing the real amount of influence which the CLARKS and KEAYS and the other washed-out imitations of Irish agrarian agitators have obtained over a sensible and hard-headed people. We shall be somewhat surprised if it does not bring about an ignominious collapse. There are limits, as we see, even to the obstruction which the Parnellites dare to offer to legislation for the advancement of the material prosperity of Ireland, and it is not at all likely that the Scotchmen who are endeavouring haud passibus æquis to make their way along the same road will venture even upon an equally guarded conversion of the interests of their countrymen into the counters of their own political game.

On general questions of contemporary Scottish politics Mr. SMITH had no very specific observations to make. But one remark of wide application—a remark, indeed, which applies to the whole of our modern system of managing our political affairs—he did make; and, if anybody wishes to measure the distance which we have travelled in the course of the last twenty years, he has only to note the extraordinary air of antiquity which now distinguishes Mr. SMITH'S simple words. Politicians, he observed, are in the habit of saying nowadays, “It is not a question whether we think Disestablishment is right or nationalization of land is right; but the question is whether the majority of the country wish it to be so; and if they do we will offer no opposition.” In other words, we will facilitate the progress of measures which in our consciences we believe to be injurious, which we personally oppose, but which, nevertheless, must pass because the people will it. This, Mr. SMITH thinks, is a “new doctrine”—as, in comparison with the age of our political system, of course it is—and he adds that it is a very evil doctrine that “a politician, being placed in a post of leadership, abdicates his position of leader, and follows where he ought to guide.” Moreover, he goes on, in his resolute antiquarianism, to recall the fact that “in old times,” in the House of Commons and in this country, if a man could not personally stay a current which he believed to be wrong, “he did not place himself at the head of it, and lead on to the attainment of the object which he thought wrong,” but stood aside, and allowed those who believed in the wisdom of the policy to be the instruments for giving effect to it. And Mr. SMITH sums up the matter in the daring declaration that he does not believe it to be right for a statesman “to accommodate his principles and his views to those of the multitude whom he believes to be wrong.” It is all very well for the smaller satirists of the Radical party to sneer at these observations as commonplace; but, as a matter of fact, they are nothing of the kind; nor are they ever treated as such, except in the most purely theoretical fashion, by Mr. GLADSTONE and his followers. They represent the maxims of a school of political morality from which these politicians have ostentatiously cut themselves off. So far from enunciating a moral obligation which everybody recognizes—the proper definition of an ethical commonplace—they enunciate one which has ceased to be regarded as binding in action by a full half of our public men, and which many of them do not hesitate to disavow in words. So far from Mr. SMITH'S propositions being truisms, they have become paradoxes; and when that happens to a doctrine of the most elementary morality, it is surely a little awkward.

LORD ROSEBERY AND MR. HAGGIS.

THE result of the sitting which has preserved to the London County Council the services of the first of the above-named officers, and acquired for them those of the second, must be regarded as highly satisfactory on the former score, and fairly so on the latter. There seems reasonable ground to expect that the new Deputy Chairman will prove a capable administrator, and his appointment has, therefore, a claim to positive approval. In the next place, it is negatively welcome for the reason that it is the appointment of Mr. HAGGIS, and not that of one of certain other persons whose names might be mentioned. The substantial vote cast for Mr. FARDELL, and the not inconsiderable support claimed by Mr. ECCLESTON GIBB, are incidents pointing the same way as the selection of Mr. HAGGIS by his party. That is to say, the favour shown to two Moderates, and the adoption of a “working” instead of a talking Progressive, afford pretty clear indications that the power of the party who were evidently proposing some time back to “boss the whole show” is by no means so commanding as they had fondly imagined. We may take it as certain that they have had a lesson, and that the experience of their own private deliberations—some slightly impassioned echoes from which were audible in Mr. DAVIES'S attack on the proposer of Mr. ECCLESTON GIBB—has sufficed to convince them that they are not quite the united little party of revolutionaries that they had hoped.

Lord ROSEBERY'S re-election—or rather his assent to it, which was the only point ever in doubt—will, of course, meet with but one reception everywhere. The public are fully alive to the excellence of the qualities which he has exhibited during his year of office; while, as to the Council themselves, they have to thank their Chairman for the fact that the attitude of their more moderate and judicious fellow-citizens towards them is still only one of suspended judgment leaning somewhat to the unfavourable side, and not one of absolute condemnation. And he has saved their reputation to this extent, not by virtue of any political prepossessions—for Lord ROSEBURY is at least as progressive in his principles as the majority could wish—but simply by the exercise of those personal faculties and aptitudes in which the Progressive is too often, and, in proportion to his progressiveness, so sadly to seek. Not once, but many times, has the Chairman of the County Council shown that he regards that assembly as a body appointed to perform functions of a strictly municipal kind, and that he has no notion of allowing it to be converted into a "Two Hundred" for the propagation of Radical opinions and the promotion of Radical interests in a set of too Conservative Parliamentary constituencies. His reply of thanks to the Council for electing him was conceived in his usual graceful and felicitous manner, and the little side hit at the Local Government Board may well be overlooked. It is excusable enough, on the part of the Chairman of what is certainly an important body, to magnify its importance somewhat on an occasion like this, and personally perhaps he may feel a slight soreness at his failure to induce the Government to apply exceptional legislative treatment to the London Council. But, after all, that body does not consist wholly of Lord ROSEBERIES; it has got to make good its claim to the confidence, or even to the respect, of the majority of its educated fellow-citizens; and in the meantime it is difficult to advance any really sound reason for treating it otherwise than its fellows throughout the country. Under Lord ROSEBURY'S continued guidance it may quite possibly develop a claim to such special treatment; but it has certainly not done so yet.

WARM BEER.

MAGO, the Carthaginian, according to Athenæus, passed thrice through the African desert without drinking; and Diocles of Peparethus, if we may credit the statement of Deme-trius the Scepsian, drank cold water to his dying day—μέχρι τέλους. Such heroic examples are fitter to excite astonishment than to provoke imitation. Lasyrtas the Lasionian never felt the need of drink, though in all other respects he was like his fellow-men. Out of curiosity, some friends watched him for thirty days in a hot summer, and not once did they detect him in the act of drinking. At the end of the thirty days their curiosity subsided, and they returned to their ordinary occupations. Lasyrtas did sometimes take drink, but on these rare occasions he was guided by choice, not compelled by necessity. It does not follow that, because we are unable to emulate the abstemiousness of Lasyrtas, we should take for our model the Athenian Diotimus, who had drink poured unceasingly down his throat through a funnel. Drink we must, upon a just necessity; but it behoves us to be circumspect. Sir Thomas Browne, in Vulgar Errors, did not hesitate to attack the popular belief that it is good to be drunk once a month—"a common flattery of sensuality, supporting itself upon physick and the healthful effects of inebriation." Avicenna, indeed, countenanced the popular view; but Averroes was for restraining "ebriety unto hilarity, and in effect making no more thereof than Seneca commendeth and was allowable in Cato; that is, a sober incalescence and regulated æstuation from wine." Mnesitheus, the Athenian physician, in his letter On Tippling (περὶ κωθωνισμού) speaks somewhat hesitatingly. He condemns those who make it their constant practice to drink inordinate quantities of unmixed wine at banquets; but he seems to be of opinion that occasional indulgence in hard drinking relieves both body and mind—ποιεῖ τινα καὶ τοῦ σώματος καθαρίσιν καὶ τῆς ψυχῆς ἀνεσιν.

We do not propose to enter upon a delicate discussion as to where sobriety ends and inebriety begins. Far less is it our intention to attempt to enumerate the various liquors concocted in past or present times by the ingenuity of man. It is not to be doubted that our national drink now, as in the past, is beer. "Bring us in good ale, and bring us in good ale," sang the old lyricist; and the same cry rises from countless throats to-day. Few, however, would desire to have their ale brought in hot. Of course, we admit that dog's-nose, egg-hot, ruddle, and the like are agreeable stimulants on a frosty night to drive the cold winter away; but for ordinary workaday purposes, whether in winter or summer, cold beer is the accepted drink. We should have been slow to believe that the drinking of cold beer could be considered hurtful if we had not lighted on an ingenious little treatise published at Cambridge in 1641:—Warne Beere; or, a Treatise wherein is declared by many reasons that Beere so qualified is farre more wholesome than that which is drunke cold. With a confutation of such objections that are made against it; published for the preservation of health. The writer, who modestly conceals his name, pleads his cause with enthusiasm, but candidly states in the preface that he has no great hope of working a general reform. He reminds us that the long continuance of errors makes men blind and deaf, "be the truth never so apparent, not unlike the owl as Aristotle saith, whose sight the sunbeams dull." But he is confident that the discerning few will take his words to heart and be duly grateful. "I write nothing here," he solemnly concludes, "which I hold not for the truth, and have made long experience of both by myself and divers of my friends. I have therefore published it in our native tongue, respecting a generall good, referring the commendations of the thing to the proof, and us all to the Almighty. Amen." After the author's preface follows an address to the reader by the publisher, who had printed the treatise not for the sake of gain, but from a desire to benefit the community. The publisher, when he drank his beer cold, used to be troubled with stomach-ache, tooth-ache, cough, cold, and many rheumatic complaints; but since he had taken to drinking beer (small or strong) "actually hot as blood," he had continued in good health. When he heard that a worthy gentleman had written a book in commendation of warm beer he begged to be allowed to examine the MS. Finding that the author's arguments squared with his own observations, he was strengthened in his judgment and confirmed in his custom. He showed the treatise to various friends, and recounted to them the history of his own experiences. They begged him to publish the work, and to explain in print the benefits that he had received in his own person from the use of warm beer. One of these benefits was that, since he had taken his beer warm, he had not known thirst. "Let the weather be never so hot," he declares, "and my work great, yet have I not felt thirst as formerly. Nay, although I have eaten fish or flesh never so salt, which ordinarily do cause thirst and driness, yet I have been freed from it by the use of hot beer." He admits that a draught of cool ale is pleasant to a thirsty man; but warns us that pleasant things are for the most part dangerous. For consumptive patients warm beer is invaluable. He had known some who were so far gone in consumption that they seemed to have but a bare week to live, and were unable to walk about the room without panting and blowing. They drank any quantity of hot wine, but thereby merely succeeded in heating their livers. When they were induced to discard hot wine, and try hot beer, the improvement in their condition was marvellous. Within a month they were able to walk about their garden with ease; within two months they could walk four miles; and in three months' time they were as well as ever they had been in their lives.

The treatise is divided into six chapters. In the first chapter the author has some general remarks on the use and necessity of drink. He proceeds in the next chapter to argue that thirst can be quenched as easily by hot drink as by cold. The third chapter is an examination of the arguments put forward in favour of cold drink; the fourth proclaims the "hurt that ariseth from actual cold drink"; and the fifth dwells upon the benefits that result from the practice of drinking warm beer. In the sixth chapter the author adduces various authorities to prove that the ancients appreciated the virtues of hot drinks. Many are the objections brought against cold beer, but the general argument may be briefly stated—"Drink taken cold into the Stomach indamageth our Life." The lungs are affected by cold drink; "squincy" (quinsey) is produced; or we lose our sense of hearing. At Marfield (near where the author dwelt), in Sussex, one day a hammerman came in hot and fell to drinking cold beer. He went mad in consequence and died not long after.

We have not yet had the courage to try a course of warm beer. But let it be remembered that Macklin the actor, who lived to a prodigious age, drank daily for thirty years a pint of hot stout at the Antelope in White Hart Yard, Covent Garden. He declared that it balmed his stomach and removed inward pains.

THE ENGLISH CHURCH UNDER HENRY VIII.

UNDER this heading Mr. Gladstone in the Nineteenth Century of this month answers some criticisms made on his article on "The Elizabethan Settlement of Religion," which appeared in the same magazine in July last year. The position which he then undertook to maintain was, briefly, that the legal basis of the Elizabethan settlement was laid by the Church itself, and that the changes which freed it from foreign control were not made without, or against, it, but by the synodical action of the clergy, led by the bishops, among whom we are to reckon Warham, Tunstal, and Fisher; and that, this being so, the juridical position of the Church, and its doctrines and practices, are not to be rejected as the mere creations of the Civil power, but must be judged according to their inherent value. For the Church never rescinded its own acts in these matters; the basis which it laid in the reign of Henry VIII. remained unchanged as far as ecclesiastical legislation was concerned, and was ready to the hands of those who built upon it in the reign of Elizabeth. The questions involved in these propositions were argued in Mr. Gladstone's original article, and are supported in the article before us with considerable skill. We rejoice to find him again engaged in an historical defence of the relations between Church and State, and in a vindication of the identity of the Church of England of the present day with the Church founded by St. Augustine, which spread first over the kingdoms of the Heptarchy, and, long before the final conquest of the country, over Wales. While he does not seem to us to have established any fact which ought to be "matter of surprise to most readers" who are acquainted with his subject, he has stated both his facts and his conclusions in a somewhat novel and decidedly striking manner. Indeed we think that his endeavours to put the purely legal side of the ecclesiastical changes of Henry's reign in as strong a light as possible make it not unlikely that his articles may mislead uninstructed readers as to the position of the clergy during the years 1529 to 1535. Before entering on this, however, it will be convenient to consider one of the minor points—a sufficiently serious one in itself, as he allows—in dispute between him and his critics.

In his first article he asserted that Bishop Fisher took the oath of Succession of 1534, in common with the rest of the bishops. This "surprising statement" was strenuously denied by the Rev. J. Morris, S.J., in the Dublin Review of October of last year, and a large part of Mr. Gladstone's present article is devoted to a reply to Mr. Morris's denial. He quotes a passage from Sander's De Origine et Processu Schismatis Anglicani, edition 1586, which says that Fisher persuaded some of his fellow-prelates to take the oath, and argues that it may therefore reasonably be concluded that Fisher took it himself, though he afterwards suffered death for refusing it. Mr. Gladstone remarks that this passage, and indeed twelve consecutive pages of the original, are left out in Mr. Lewis's translation of the De Origine. In a short note, however, in the Tablet of Saturday last, it was pointed out that the first edition of the De Origine was published in 1585, that it does not contain the passage in question, and that Mr. Lewis had done exactly what he professed to do—namely, translate this edition. Sander wrote his book mostly in Spain, and died in Ireland in 1581, before it was published. Rishton was persuaded by Dr. Skanhert, of Cologne, to edit Sander's papers, on the ground that if they were not edited by an Englishman errors would no doubt be made. He brought out the book at Cologne in 1585, with the following notice, which we quote from the Preface:—"Loca nonnulla quæ scribarum vitio depravata vel authoris festinatione minus explicata fuerant, correxi. Quædam etiam quæ longioribus disputationibus implicata videbantur, ut historiæ series melius teneretur, amovi, plurima quæ deerant, maxime vero post mortem D. Sanderi, adjunxi." Rishton died before the end of 1585. Another edition, from which Mr. Gladstone takes his quotation, was published at Rome in 1586, and another at Ingoldstadt in 1587. In both these occur large additions, among which is the passage in dispute, and several omissions. Other editions, with more matter added, appeared in 1610 and 1628. Of these various versions Le Grand says:—"Ces nouvelles éditions sont si différentes de la première qu'on peut dire que c'est un nouvel ouvrage" (Histoire du Divorce, t. ii., p. 6, 1688), and a careful comparison of the second edition with Rishton's book enables us to confirm his statement. Bayle says that the later editions contain matters which Rishton cut out of Sander's book. For this, however, he gives no authority, and he is not an author whom we are inclined to follow implicitly. Rishton, as we have seen, only speaks of cutting out disputations and correcting obvious errors. Sander's papers are, we believe, still in existence at Rome, and their publication under competent editorship is much to be wished. For the present it is impossible, without good corroborative evidence, to attach any weight to the additions made to Rishton's edition. At first sight it may seem strange that a story to the martyred bishop's discredit should have been inserted in a book published at Rome; but it is obvious that it was founded on a confusion between Fisher's conduct with regard to the Recognition in 1531 and the oath of 1534. We may note by the way that, though we allow that Hall, who wrote his still unpublished Life of Fisher in the reign of Queen Mary, may have dressed up the speech on the Recognition which he attributes to the Bishop, we cannot accept Mr. Gladstone's airy condemnation of his account of Fisher's part in the debate. It should also be observed that the Roman story puts Fisher's repentance so prominently forward that it tends to heighten the reader's reverence for a man who, having fallen through another's deceit, repented so deeply and made such full amends. Mr. Gladstone's ingenious theory that Fisher, though he had previously taken the oath, refused it, for the first time, on May 1st, in consequence of having heard the news of the Pope's final sentence, which arrived in England on April 12, must, we think, be rejected. Fisher refused the oath at Lambeth on April 13, and all that we know of his life at that period makes it highly improbable that he should have taken it between that date and the previous March 23rd, when the oath became obligatory. Unless Mr. Gladstone has better authority for his statement than his edition of the De Origine, we must decline to accept it; Fisher needed no Papal guidance to teach him that to a man who thought as he did the oath was sinful.

Mr. Gladstone successfully disposes of the plea that the Recognition of the King's Supremacy by Convocation was an insignificant act which called for no repeal. Convocation did not treat the matter as insignificant; and it is a remarkable fact that, though all the important ecclesiastical statutes of the reign of Henry VIII. were repealed by Parliament in the reign of Philip and Mary, Convocation did not retract the Recognition of 1531 or the denial of the Pope's right to jurisdiction in 1534. Yet we must not suppose that the bulk of the clergy was content with the Royal Supremacy, for the petition of the Lower House of Convocation in the first year of Queen Mary, and the articles which it sent to the Upper House in the first Convocation of Elizabeth's reign, are alone sufficient to prove the contrary. On the question of how far the validity of the Recognition is affected by the pressure brought to bear upon the clergy, Mr. Gladstone justly remarks that coercion must not be put forward as an argument against the legal validity of the action of a large body. Yet, while we concur in his doctrine, we think that he makes too light of the compulsion to which the clergy were subjected. They had already, in 1529, had proof of the strong anti-clerical feeling of the Parliament, and knew that they had nothing to hope for on that side. Moreover, they knew that the King, who showed evidence of a good deal more than "pertinacity" throughout the whole business, was prepared to spite the Church if he was not gratified; for, to quote from Bishop Stubbs, he "threatened intrigue with the German Protestants, or the restraint of mortmain, or the appointment of a council of heresy, which would take that question out of the hands of Convocation, and other things which, vague threats at first, became realities of oppression as soon as they were familiarized to his mind." Above all, they were involved in the tremendous penalties of Præmunire, and they were compelled to purchase pardon by such concessions as would be accepted, for they had to deal with a King whose wrath was as the messengers of death. Nor must we forget that the Submission of 1532 was in like manner by no means a purely voluntary act. The unwillingness of the clergy to recognize the Supremacy proceeded, Mr. Gladstone contends, from anxiety to preserve the liberties of the Church, and not from any regard for the Papal jurisdiction. In this we think that he is undoubtedly right. The Church of England was never strongly Papal, and the great Churchmen of the reign certainly did not regard Rome with much reverence. Tunstal's protest does not contain a word about the Papal claims; it expresses somewhat indirectly a feeling that the new titles implied a tendency to trespass on the domain of the spirituality; and Gardiner's De Vera Obedientia, Fox's De Vera Differentia, Sampson's Oration, and other works, indicate the opinion of a large part of the leading clergy with regard to Papal interference. It should, however, be remembered that neither in 1531 nor in 1534 could the clergy have supposed that the King intended to put a complete stop to the exercise of Papal jurisdiction within his kingdom in spiritual things. Henry put forward his demands as an assertion of the ancient rights of the Crown, and not as claiming some new prerogatives; and the clergy, in recognizing his new titles, did not, we may be sure, see the full consequences of their act. Yet they struggled hard to avoid the Recognition, and finally only granted it with an important qualification. They acknowledged the King as "Ecclesiæ et cleri Anglicani singularis protector, unicus et supremus dominus, et, quantum per legem Christi licet, etiam supremum caput." Mr. Gladstone objects to Mr. Morris's contention that the second title, "dominus," refers to feudal lordship, and, on the strength of some expressions in the protest of Tunstal and Henry's letter in answer to it, seems to extend the meaning to imply dominion in things spiritual. Here we think that he is clearly wrong. The phrase "supremus dominus" belongs to feudal terminology, though it must not, of course, be taken as an assertion that the Church was a tenant-in-chief; for that would be nonsense. It should, we contend, be taken with the first phrase, and they would then signify together the duty and the rights of the Crown as regards the Church in things temporal. Mr. Morris's idea that the title of "Protector" of a local and national Church is synonymous with that of "Defender of the [Catholic] Faith" is not worth refutation. The lordship of the King over the Church in things temporal needed no qualification. With regard to the title "Supremum caput," which we take as referring to spiritual things and persons, the case was different, for the Crown had generally forbore from interfering in spiritual matters proper, and the clergy, jealous for the liberties of the Church, and in some cases, no doubt, unwilling to seem to act contrary to the Pope, insisted, in spite of their fear of the King, on a saving clause. Short as Mr. Gladstone's two articles are, they touch on so many points of interest and dispute that we cannot pretend to criticize them fully in the space at our disposal. While we believe that they contain some mistakes—one of a rather serious kind in the first article is acknowledged in the article before us—and think that they scarcely represent fairly the position of the clergy with regard to the changes which they were forced to make part of the law of the Church, they seem to us to establish the writer's main propositions, and to exhibit with singular clearness and felicity the ecclesiastical legality of the basis of the "Elizabethan settlement of religion."

THE PRIME MINISTER ON ELECTRICITY.

A SPECIAL interest is always attached to the utterances and writings of eminent statesmen on subjects not directly connected with their public duties. We know beforehand the general relations which the working of their minds has to the problems of current politics. We can guess whither the drift of any speeches they may make will tend. We can anticipate their sharpness or their dreariness, their liveliness or their stupidity. We have previously measured their long-windedness, and meted out their dulness. Their truthfulness, or the reverse, is already weighed in the balance of our anticipations. But when a statesman departs from the beaten track of making or contradicting political statements, he opens, as it were, a window into the ark of his mind, and we all struggle to raise our eyes to the porthole, and to get a glimpse of the machinery within. We are lucky when the interior is illuminated by electricity. For, although we have had, from our youth upwards, quite the average amount of admiration for Homer and his works, and although we have diligently peered into every chink that has ever been opened to us in Mr. Gladstone's mental ark, we never were able to see anything very clearly. The engines always seemed to be very compound, and the steering-gear erratic. But these strange phenomena may have been illusions, owing to the fact that every porthole was fitted with a perpetually revolving kaleidoscope in automatic connexion with the rudder.

Lord Salisbury has not often come forward in the character of a man of speculative mind. His excursions into the electrical future of the world will, therefore, interest us the more. And it is characteristic of his eminently practical mind that, in doing so, he dwelt on a development of electrical science which is at first sight excessively unsensational—the subdivision of energy, and its transmission over moderate spaces. But, while Mr. Gladstone was suggesting a philanthropic scheme of legislation, by which an allotment garden was to be brought to every cottage door, ignoring as usual the main practical difficulty in the way of its realization, that cottages are usually in streets and streets usually in towns, the Prime Minister was pointing out that the subdivision and transmission of electrical energy might, in the future, benefit the artisan more than all the philanthropic legislation in the world. What he claims is, that it may enable the artisan, his wife, and his children to carry on in their own homes many of the industries which are now carried on in factories; and so enable them to “sustain that unity, that integrity of the family, upon which rest the moral hopes of our race and the strength of the community to which we belong.” But the picture of the altered life is not only morally hopeful, it is æsthetically hopeful; although this is the very last aspect of the question which is likely to have weight with him. And it would be a queer nemesis if the art-socialistic school were forestalled in most of their highest aims, not by legislation, but by a series of scientific inventions suggested by a Tory Prime Minister.

It may be worth while to fill in the outlines of the hopeful picture with a little detail. In the first place, it is evident, and the language of the prophecy has taken this into account, that there are many industries to which subdivision of energy is inapplicable. In all cases, for instance, where the object to be laboured on is not portable, as in the case of a ship, or an iron girder, or a carpet, the labour must come to the mountain, and not the mountain to the labour. And this applies to all cases where the object laboured on has to undergo a rapid succession of processes, as in the case of the manufacture of paper or chemicals. But, apart from these industries, there are many others in which the workmen and women only congregate together because the energy which they use cannot at present be obtained in their own dwellings. Turnery, cabinet-making, instrument-manufacture, cutlery, book-binding, pottery, are all, to some extent, instances in point. There will, therefore, be a very large number to benefit by the change when it comes.

The practicability of the scheme is also well worth considering. It is, of course, a matter of pounds, shillings, and pence. Lord Salisbury is not a man to suggest the possibility of an industrial change on a large scale founded on charity. But, besides being an enemy to all attempts to interfere with the natural working of economic laws, he is an electrician. And when we use this word, we do not merely mean to imply that he is a man who has read one or two popular text-books on electricity, and bought some nicely polished machines, which will give pleasant shocks to his friends, but one who has published the results of original research to the satisfaction of his scientific brethren, and who has also carried out in his own person (when out of office) the duties of an electrical engineer. He can, therefore, speak on this subject with an authority very different from that of the Hawarden lecturer on jam, who has, we venture to say, wielded the axe more often than the spade, and who has not, to the best of our knowledge, passed an apprenticeship in the still-room. His opinion, therefore, that the present condition of electrical science foreshadows such an industrial change should be accepted as being of great weight, especially as it met with acquiescence in the assembly of experts which he was addressing. The economic elements of the question seem to favour his view at no distant date. Let us glance at some of the changes which will be produced in the industries to which the new state of things will apply.

At present a large part of the capital sunk in any manufacture where labour is congregated in considerable quantities has been spent in the erection of buildings and machinery. Under the contemplated system the buildings required will be few or none. The machinery, as far as the original sources of energy are concerned, will be the property of the local electrical supply Company, who will sell so much energy to each artisan direct. This supply of energy, conveyed in the form of electricity by underground mains, will be measured at its entrance to each workman's rooms by an electrical meter. This portion of capital, therefore, which is now supplied by the firm, will in the future be supplied by the electrical lighting Company—a transference on no small scale. Whether the cost of the motors and other machinery necessary for the conversion of electrical into mechanical energy in each dwelling will be ultimately borne by the employer or the artisan remains to be seen. At present the supply of energy, and not its conversion, is the important point. Even with the most perfect systems of transmission and subdivision that can be looked forward to, there is likely to be a greater loss of energy between the source and the points of expenditure than is the case in a compact factory at present. On the other hand, there are some economies. The electrical source of energy is, by hypothesis, large enough to supply the wants of a manufacturing district. Unlike centralization in national government, centralization in boilers and engines is in itself economical. Unused electrical energy has also a pleasant way of getting stored up, and also of putting out (like a horse) extra strength when required. And, finally, we shall probably be enabled to use the forces of rivers and tides at a cheaper rate than the force due to the combustion of coal.

Such details as these, and no doubt many others, were in Lord Salisbury's mind when he made his general prophecy. But his remarks on the past effects of electricity (and, indeed, other forces brought under control by men of science) were no less interesting. And in these he was supported by experts who have special knowledge both of the civil and military results of its application to their own experiences.

THE COURT BUREAU.

EVERY new departure in sound philanthropy, every intelligent application of the co-operative principle which may tend to improve the condition and brighten the lives of the working classes, has our sympathy. But there has really been such a plethora of well-meaning schemes in this direction, most of which are still waiting for execution and practical test, that it is a positive relief to have before us a project intended for the benefit of other classes. There are in this wealthy country of ours hosts of people who, though enjoying the possession of plenty of worldly goods, find their lives sorely harassed by innumerable small cares, daily worries, tedious formalities, and the drudgeries of society. It is, therefore, not surprising that a scheme should have been formulated with the view to minimize exertion, prevent disappointments, avoid vexations, and save time. It should be an advantage to society in general, if such of its members whose positions, fortune, talents, and learning render them influential factors in our national life, could be liberated from some of the many dry, uncongenial, and purely business tasks that encroach so seriously upon time and energies which could be so much better employed. The more intense life becomes the briefer it appears; and we can ill afford to waste even a particle of it.

The scheme before us is the “Court Bureau,” which, according to the preliminary prospectus, is to be a Fashionable Registry, Information, and Daily Agency. If the Court Bureau be intelligently established and ably administered, it will, no doubt, meet a number of keenly-felt wants. If it shows itself worthy of the powerful support which it has already secured, it may constitute the starting-point of an entirely new departure, pregnant with many developments in various directions. The Bureau is intended to function as a kind of self-acting Directory. It will not only supply information as to the whereabouts of its members, but will actually transmit letters and give every facility for correspondence. In the case of invitations, visiting-cards, and formal communications, such will be printed, addressed, forwarded, and received by the Bureau. Though every member will be able to supply all the members, and the public in general, with his address, whatever his whereabouts may be, he can enter upon correspondence with everybody without revealing his movements, or his abode, to any except the Bureau, if he so choose. In the tiresome task of house-hunting, of selecting chambers, apartments, and hotels, the Court Bureau may render very appreciable services. The telephone will, of course, be utilized to the fullest extent, and connect the Bureau with theatres, concert-halls, railway-stations, restaurants, livery-stables, &c. The prompt supply of unobjectionable vehicles at moderate and fixed rates will be welcomed by many whose nerves are not equal to the tirades of unreasonable cabbies.

The promoters of the Court Bureau, perhaps wisely, refrain from giving the programme of the future developments of which their undertaking is obviously capable; but it is easy to surmise that, once a centre is furnished in which all the wealth, rank, and talent of Britishers, at home and abroad, can be focussed with the view to gain ease, comfort, information, and amusement, the foundations of far-reaching possibilities are laid. Of this the promoters seem well aware. But all will depend on management; and we have no doubt this will prove worthy of the importance and wide scope of the scheme. There are many directions in which the Court Bureau might render service to society. It might facilitate the subscriptions to newspapers, periodicals, and engravings; assist us in embellishing our homes with art-treasures and objects of applied art under the guarantee of genuineness; protect us against modern adulterations and impostures; supply information on such subjects as interest the educated classes more especially; gratify the modern desire for wider intercourse and a less retiring life; bring wealth and talent into more close relation; extend the influence of literature and art over society; elevate and enliven our social amusements; contribute the elements of English home-life to our fellow-countrymen abroad; and weld British society in all parts of the world into one harmonious whole. The leaders of the new movement, if they choose, have thus a wide scope before them, and, as support is not likely to fail them, they have a rare opportunity of trying their hand at one of the most interesting experiments of modern times—an experiment which we shall follow with the greatest interest.

ARCHITECTURE AND ART.

IF the Art Congress at Edinburgh accomplished no other useful work, the result of the discussions on city architecture may prove beneficial. The subject is one in which a majority of civilized beings are, or ought to be, interested. More Englishmen live in great cities than in the country. Architectural effects in the country only matter much to perhaps a single family in one place. Architectural effects in London, Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, and other cities matter a great deal to millions. Mr. Statham, whose sensible paper, read on the Wednesday of the meeting, seems to have started the subject, says of Hyde Park Corner that "an irrepressible and mischievous Commissioner of Works" has had the arch at the head of Constitution Hill rebuilt so as to stand on the side of a slope and to cut into the middle of an irregular curve, and to face nothing in particular. The space in front he calls "the very centre of the social circulating system of London," and quotes the old story of the foreigner who addressed a letter to Apsley House as "No. 1, London." This conspicuous place is cut up into meaningless "leg-of-mutton-shaped spaces between intersecting roadways." Of course, the present state of things cannot last for ever—cannot last very long, we may venture to hope. The arch must come back to the summit of the slope, and perhaps span one of the "intersecting roadways," at the same time standing square with Apsley House, and the successor, whatever it may be, of St. George's Hospital. Sir Joseph Boehm's statue is not so superior to Wyatt's that any of us would regret its elevation with its attendant soldiers to a more dignified and appropriate situation on the top of the arch, while the entrance to the Green Park might well be marked by the completion of Burton's scheme and the erection of another screen, for which he left an elaborate design, like that which we must all admire at the entrance of Hyde Park. Mr. Statham was followed by Mr. Blashill, the architect of the London County Council, who plaintively bewailed his inability to secure the services of good architects. We do not expect much from the present Council, and, probably, the less we expect the better; but at some future time there may be fuller power to restrain the builders of some of the monstrosities now rising into sight. Unfortunately the most important and conspicuous places are already filled. Mr. Blashill speaks of sending back one design four times for amendment. He had no power to reject it altogether; and surely he puts the case too mildly when he says that a friend of his feigns sickness at the sight of the building. There is a theatre in Shaftesbury Avenue, rapidly approaching completion, which is enough, if not to make a student of architecture sick, at least to render him so sad and so indignant at the disfigurement of a conspicuous situation that absolute physical nausea would be only one step further. But, in truth, Shaftesbury Avenue, from Regent's Circus with its awful lamp-posts onwards, is a museum of every anomaly and abomination of which the rampant builder is capable. It would be libelling the contemporary architectural school to assume that as many as one in ten of the new buildings had the advantage of professional supervision; but, unfortunately, it is to those exceptions that our remarks must chiefly apply. It is the same in the two other new streets of most importance which have been laid out and built in our time. There are, perhaps, two inoffensive new houses, or blocks, in Victoria Street, Westminster; there is not one, if we except a Post Office, whose features are only rows of plain windows, in Queen Victoria Street. We have only to think of the Times office, of the elephantine building of the Bible Society, and of the mock Italian Gothic shops at the Mansion House extremity of the street, and all these and others are in the same row with St. Benet, Paul's Wharf, St. Andrew-by-the-Wardrobe, St. Mary Aldermary, and the Herald's College; to say nothing of one of Wren's masterpieces, the spire of St. Antholin, which was pulled down to make way for some of these fearful artistic abortions. We used to be told that Northumberland Avenue was to be a street of palaces, to exceed in beauty and stately dignity the Via Nuova at Genoa or our own Pall Mall. Look at it now. There is not a single redeeming architectural feature in the whole street of gigantic stone fronts. But London is not alone in these complaints. Manchester has suffered terribly, and the public buildings in most of the great manufacturing towns are equally bad. Liverpool, with St. George's Hall, and the Library and Museum near it, has some good effects; but many provincial buildings have a defect, which is even more conspicuous in London—namely, the addition to a poor design of still poorer sculpture by way of ornament. The modern architect about to erect a building of polished granite—there are several such buildings in the City—cares nothing about proportion. He is under the impression—a most mistaken one—that so costly a material must of necessity produce beauty. It is the same with ornament. Every one must agree with Mr. J. D. Sedding, who, in a paper read at the end of the Edinburgh Congress, said that "the highest excellence in architecture could be attained in a building alone, apart from sculptural embellishment."

The truth of Mr. Sedding's postulate is illustrated by the present state of such a building as the Parthenon at Athens. Can any one deny that it is beautiful, although the sculpture belonging to it is thousands of miles away in the British Museum, and though it never had carved capitals or bosses of polished granite? Good sculpture will set off a good building; but good sculpture on a bad building is, to use a forcible Scripture, "a jewel in a swine's snout." Unfortunately for us, the ornamental sculpture of the present day is too often worthy of the design it is expected to redeem. In some cases the sculpture is bad, while the building is good. A conspicuous example is afforded by St. George's Hall at Liverpool, where the equestrian statues and some other "embellishments" are a detraction from the beauty of the principal front. The sculptors at Edinburgh seem to have thought that good carving was even more important in a building than a good design; but this idea might have been refuted in two words by a mere mention of the "Albert Memorial." If there is any good sculpture in London, it is here; yet it cannot make the cross beautiful, or even tolerable. On the contrary, it seems rather to accentuate the shortcomings of the architect. The tendency of the teaching of the past few years has been to exalt detail at the expense of proportion. Some strong language was used at the Congress as to the influence of such writers as Mr. Ruskin on contemporary taste, and one gentleman was so bold as to pronounce that eminent professor "a drag on English art." Without going nearly so far as this, we may at least be permitted to inquire if any one ever learnt anything about design in architecture from reading such a book as The Stones of Venice? But Mr. Hole would not have been wrong in condemning the whole course of modern architectural study, and especially that branch of it which relates to Gothic detail. While nothing can exceed the beauty of a genuine Gothic building, it is not by studying mouldings and applying microscopic eyesight to carved capitals that a young architect will learn to emulate the proportions of Salisbury Cathedral or of the Sainte Chapelle. So, too, in what is erroneously called the classical style, no piling up of marble pillars, or the most lavish display of vases, can cover an ignorance of the relation of the height to the diameter of a Corinthian column. Yet this ignorance is everywhere to be seen in our great cities. One of the most beautiful buildings in London was Burlington House, and it was remarkable for its plainness and the absence of sculptural decoration. If we go to look at it now, we can with some difficulty pick out a fragment of the old design, and can contrast it with the new additions, in which the most elaborate and profuse carving is used. The absolute poverty of the design is not in any way masked or condoned by the sculpture, which covers almost every part of the street front. To design like Lord Burlington implied taste, but not taste only. It implied also knowledge and study. In the address of the President of the Institute of Architects on Monday, for example, there was nothing about building as a fine art, if we except a reference to the Eiffel Tower. There was a good deal about registration and examination, and so on, but never a word about design, or proportion, or unity, or harmony. These are things upon which few modern architects will spend their time; and why, indeed, should they, while the British public is content with its Shaftesbury Avenues and its Charing Cross Roads, and while the British sculptor is willing to step forward and is confident that a little more carving, a little more polishing and gilding, will conceal every result of ignorance, carelessness, and laziness? It is, indeed, sad to reflect that Regent Street, with the stucco pilasters and pediments of sixty years ago, is still superior to all its new neighbours, with their marble and mosaic music-halls and their "Christian pointed" gin-palaces.

THE FREE BANKING AGITATION.

MR. EGMONT HAKE, Chairman of the Free-trade in Capital League, is an earnest and energetic man, who, having once joined a movement, is resolved that it shall not lag if he can help it. He is holding meetings all over the country to bring to the attention of the people the objects for which the League was formed. And the other day, in Dundee, he expounded its principles very clearly. This is well, for it is only by full discussion that what is true in new ideas can be sifted from what is fallacious. Most persons, we apprehend, will agree with Mr. Hake that the banking legislation of 1844 and 1845 was mistaken. The school of economists whose views were adopted by Sir Robert Peel held that financial crises were the result of the over-issue of banknotes, and they recommended, therefore, that the right of issue should be regulated and restricted. The numerous panics and crises that have since occurred show that this theory was erroneous. The truth, of course, is that inflation is the consequence, not the cause, of speculation, and when speculation is rife, if banking accommodation cannot be obtained in one form, it will certainly be in another. But, though the grounds on which the banking legislation of 1844-5 was based were wrong, the public will not conclude, therefore, that that legislation ought to be repealed or remodelled, unless it can be shown that it injures some great public interest. Mr. Hake recognizes this, and he proceeded at Dundee, as he had previously done on several occasions, to argue that, in fact, our present banking system is injurious to the community, and more especially to the poorer classes. Sir Robert Peel's legislation restricted the right of issue to the banks then exercising the right, and took away from those banks the power of increasing their issues at pleasure. Against all augmented issues they are now required to hold an equivalent amount of gold. Nobody will dispute, we presume, that it is wrong in principle to give a monopoly of any kind of business to any number of institutions; and, as the object of the legislation of 1844-5 has not been attained, it is clear that, in principle at all events, that legislation stands condemned. But, while this must be freely granted, it remains to be proved that an adequate object is to be gained by repealing the legislation. Mr. Hake endeavours to prove the point by contending that the issuing banks possess a monopoly, and, being restricted in its exercise, are deprived of all inducement to increase the note circulation of the country. Where banks are free to issue notes to any extent which they can keep in circulation they search out the persons who are most in want of accommodation, who are most likely to keep the notes circulating, and who will employ them most profitably. But these persons, he adds, are nearly always poor men of character, industry, and enterprise—men, that is, who have not capital of their own, but yet are qualified to employ capital very remuneratively. A free banking system, then, according to Mr. Hake, stimulates the banks to give accommodation to the classes who are most competent to increase the wealth of the community, whereas our present banking system encourages the banks to neglect the interests of the enterprising poor, and to limit their operations almost entirely to the well-to-do. The well-to-do have an obvious advantage as borrowers over the poor, for they can give better security. Unless, therefore, the banks have some inducement stronger than this superior security for accommodating the poor, they will decline to do so. But, according to Mr. Hake, the result of this is that a very large part of the business ability of the population lies unused; that, consequently, employment is greatly restricted; and that, therefore, the wealth of the world is prevented from growing as rapidly as it ought to do. In short, Mr. Hake's contention is that the world is suffering from under-consumption, and that this is the result of mistaken banking legislation.

We agree fully with Mr. Hake that general over-production is a contradiction in terms, and that the poverty of the world clearly proves under-consumption, or what, perhaps, would be more correctly described as insufficient purchasing power. But we are not prepared to go so far as to say that Free Banking would be a complete remedy. Unfortunately, poverty results, not from one single simple cause, but from a great variety of causes—disease, inherited or accidental; intemperance, laziness, thriftlessness, and ignorance. There are men even in the most civilized countries who will not work regularly, however advantageous the terms may be on which employment is offered to them; there are others who are incapable of working; and there are others, again, who, though they work hard enough, yet muddle away the proceeds of their labour. If every bank in England were given to-morrow the right of unlimited issue, and were to begin eagerly forcing notes into circulation, does anybody suppose that that would reform the drunkard or the criminal? Perhaps ignorance is even a more fruitful source of poverty and wasted production; and by ignorance we do not mean only lack of culture, or even of book-learning, but want of adequate information respecting the businesses in which men are engaged. Capital flows into a certain trade, year after year production is increased vastly, and for a while large profits are made. But gradually the supply exceeds the demand, stocks accumulate, and, after a while, depression takes the place of prosperity; works are closed, workmen are thrown out of employment, and there is widespread suffering. Mr. Hake will reply, no doubt, that this is an instance of under-consumption, and, in a sense, it unquestionably is. But the initial mistake was that capitalists, seeing a given trade prospering unusually, were unable to calculate how far the production might be increased without exceeding the demand, and in their ignorance brought on a crisis. If we had full statistics of every trade all over the world, and if those engaged in each particular trade would master the facts relating to their own business, there would not be this glutting of the markets. But what chance is there of getting such statistics, or of ensuring their use by all concerned. Once more, the mistaken views of Governments respecting the national interest contribute very powerfully to the dislocation of trade which occurs every now and then. This country some years ago was able to supply the world with cotton and iron goods, but the great Governments of the Continent and the United States, thinking that it would be beneficial to their subjects to create varied interests at home, adopted a policy of Protection, thereby artificially stimulating the growth of the cotton and iron trades upon the Continent and in America, and unduly increasing the world's production. The capital and labour thus attracted into channels in which they were not wanted were diverted from other industries in which they would have been far more productive, and more advantageous to the world at large, and the result is that the aggregate purchasing power of the world has not grown as it ought to have done. We venture to submit, then, that the present economic condition of the world is the result of a vast variety of causes, some more and some less influential, but all having some effect, and that it is idle to expect any very great change from an alteration in one single cause. But if we might hazard a personal opinion, we should say that the most important of all causes is ignorance. If any organization existed which would enable every person engaged in production to apply himself to that kind of work which he could do most efficiently, that would improve the world more than anything else.

Still, though we think that Mr. Hake attaches entirely too much importance to the reform he proposes, we are ready to admit that, if it were carried out, it would do some good. Undoubtedly, it is an interference with the liberty of the subject to prevent him from engaging in any kind of business which is open to other subjects of the realm. Whether Mr. Gladstone's view be right or wrong, that note-issuing, like coinage, ought to be the exclusive privilege of the State, at least it is a logical and consistent proposition. But it is not logical to give to certain banks the right of issue, and to refuse it to everybody else. Further, we are inclined to agree with Mr. Hake, that if banks were free to issue notes to an unlimited extent, they would look to the enterprising poor as those most likely to keep the notes in circulation for the longest time. The supporters of the present system would reply, no doubt, that banks ought not to be allowed to issue notes to an unlimited extent without any guarantee that they can cash them on demand. But we fail to see why the State is bound to protect the note-holder more rigorously than it protects the depositor. There is no Act of Parliament in this country requiring banks to hold a reserve sufficient to guarantee the depositors against loss; and why should the State be more careful of the interests of the note-holders than of those of the depositors? The answer used to be that notes were as effective as coin in purchases, that excessive issues inflated the circulation, and, therefore, by stimulating speculation ended by bringing on a financial crisis; but that answer can no longer be given, for we have had crises since Sir Robert Peel's legislation as serious as any before. If banks are to retain the right of issue at all, they ought to be allowed to exercise the right according to their own discretion. But, of course, in that case the note ought not to be legal tender. Everybody should be free to accept or refuse the note as he pleases. A bank under such circumstances would be able to get its notes into circulation only where its credit was good—that is to say, in its own immediate neighbourhood. And, if the people of the neighbourhood were willing to take the notes not only from the banks, but from one another in ordinary buying and selling, we see no reason why the State should step in and forbid them to do so. In all probability if Mr. Hake's proposed reform were carried out the great banks already existing would not change their present business. They would remain the banks of the well-to-do, and many of them probably would not even care to issue notes. But it may be expected that new banks would be established in considerable numbers, and, at first at all events, they would have only a local business. They would start for the purpose of accommodating a class of customers who are not now catered for, and they would depend mainly upon their note issue for conducting their business properly. No doubt it would be a risky kind of business, for the poor enterprising man would not be able to give the readily realizable security which most borrowers under our present system are required to furnish. Therefore it would require very wise and cautious management. If the business were carried on upon a very large scale, it would probably end in a crash, but if it were carried on upon a modest scale—if the managers made advances only to those whom they knew, or to strangers only where persons known to them were willing to become security—then it might do much good. It would enable many poor and deserving men to start in business for themselves, to increase the employment given in the neighbourhood, and possibly to realize handsome fortunes in the long run. This, no doubt, would be a considerable achievement. It is much less than Mr. Egmont Hake expects, but it would be a good deal if it could be realized.

THE INSTITUTE OF PAINTERS IN OIL-COLOURS.

IT is unfortunate for an exhibition that it should draw attention to what is absent from it, rather than to what is present. Yet this is to some measure the case, we are obliged to confess, with the present show at the Institute of Painters in Oil-colours. This is the seventh time that the stout little boy with inadequate wings, who sports on the cover of the Catalogue of the Institute, has so roguishly offered to draw back the curtain in front of his easel. When we saw that infant first he served to introduce us to a variety of interesting artists, whose first love seems to have cooled. The founder of the Institute was Sir James Linton, whose occasional work in oil we always welcome; but he does not exhibit this year, although he still is President. Other absentees among the leading members of the Society are Messrs. Boughton, Fred Barnard, Charles Green, Herkomer, R. W. Macbeth, Henry Moore, Shannon, J. W. Waterhouse, Caton Woodville, and W. Dendy Sadler. In other words, almost without exception, the leading artists who first gave its cachet to the Institute have, for one reason or another, not been moved this year to give it the benefit of their patronage. This is a matter by no means of indifference, because such a state of things shows, either that the Institute holds its exhibition at a time of year when it is irksome to a leading painter to get his work ready, or else that something in the constitution of the body has lessened the interest which its founders felt for it. But unless something is done to quicken that interest, the conductors of the Institute must expect a diminution of public attention.

The general level of execution at the present exhibition is, notwithstanding, rather high. The lawlessness of art in England at this moment is, however, in the absence of commanding examples, curiously shown. There is no standard of merit, no uniformity of style; on the contrary, the most opposite schools have their examples hung side by side. Here are stippled purple landscapes in the mode of Samuel Palmer, and here are misty emulations of Corot's latest manner. On one hand figure-painting which would have pleased Augustus Egg, and on the other imitations of Bastien Lepage. The visitor who wishes to amuse himself by accentuating these violent and discordant notes may turn from the following of Manet (382) to the peculiar touch of Mr. Frith (412), from the school of Lepage (286) to Mr. Cooper's sheep (295), from imitation of Mason (486) to imitation of Overbeck (500). The effect is bewildering; and if he desires a final shock, let him study the contrast between the extremely eccentric roughly-sketched head of a little red-nosed girl (254), in the latest French manner, and the highly-finished Academic group in tinted wax (253) which hangs above it. Everything seems to be welcome at the Institute, which has evidently no exclusive pride.

The best figure-piece this year, we are inclined to say, is Mr. F. D. Millet's "The Best Trump" (184)—two men in seventeenth-century dress playing cards in a country kitchen. The pigeon's head, as he bends over the fatal trump, is admirably designed, and all the accessories, which are simple, and not too much crowded, are excellent. The rook, whose back is to the light, has offered difficulties which Mr. Millet has not wholly overcome. Mr. Solomon J. Solomon's "Evening Mist" (429) is a very carefully-modelled, large, nude figure of a girl, with flowing soft red hair, rising slowly out of reeds and vapoury water, as though drawn upwards by an unseen power—that of the setting sun. The care with which this beautiful study is painted demands respect, although the motive is neither particularly happy nor strikingly intelligible. Of several careful Academic-subject pieces we may combine our impressions. Mr. Haynes-Williams's "The Proposal" (253), Mr. John Scott's "What's the Matter?" (33), and Mr. Blair Leighton's "What Shall I Say?" (310) are "powder-pieces" of the kind so characteristic of the English school for the last thirty years; skillfully composed, neatly painted, each engaged in "telling a story," either sentimentally, as in the first instance, or humorously, as in the second, or romantically, as in the third. The only fault to be found with them is that, from any truly artistic point of view, they cannot be said to be painted at all. The cleverest of the three is, without question, No. 253, with its attenuated grace and waxen polish.

Excellent landscapes are not rare at the Institute. The place of honour in the Central Gallery is given to Mr. Frank Walton for his large and highly-finished "Leith Hill" (236), a harmonious effect of autumn foliage. Mr. Wyllie has gone a little out of his usual beat, and reminds us somewhat of an early Cecil Lawson, in his capital river-scene, "The Lull before the Storm" (240). There are several good landscapes on this same wall—Mr. Adrian Stokes's brilliant, but not too brilliant, "Bank whereon the Wild Thyme grows" (219), Mr. Adam Proctor's soft, wet meadow, called "The Upland Fold" (213), and Mr. Van der Weyde's "Pastoral" (247), moonlight mingled with light of sunset in the warm foliage of pollard poplars. In the West Gallery Mr. Robert W. Allan's "Gathering Wild Flowers" (23) is an eminently fresh and breezy study of moorland. Mr. Joseph Farquharson's sheep (45) in snow are too blue in their fleeces for the light around them. Mr. Harry Hine paints a wild sea-effect well in his "Swinge off Alderney" (62). Mr. Fulleylove has achieved a signal success with his great portrait of Hampton Court, "A Royal Palace" (94), the most important work he has hitherto produced. Charming to a very high degree, and as true as it is original, is Mr. Brewtnall's "Under the Silver Moon" (118), a study of light on a calm sea breaking in ripple. The gradations of colour here are singularly subtle, the iron-grey sky, the golden sheen of the horizon, the vitreous green of the sea, the grey of the wave, the reflected blue of the wet sea-sand, all combining to form a harmony of moonlight on the waters. It may be compared with a less entirely successful, but still very clever, rendering of a similar theme in the East Gallery, Mr. Alexander Harrison's "Evening" (458), sunset iridescence on part of the surface of a dark stream closely shaded by overhanging foliage. Mr. Cotman has been very successful in his "The Ferry, Christchurch" (137), broad, simple, and full of warm, glowing light. Mr. Tom Lloyd's "Our Ducks" (145), in a similar key of sunset colour, forms a good pendant to it. Mr. Morton's "Hazy Morning, Dieppe" (173), would demand fuller praise if its clever tones were not so uniformly glassy. Mr. Walter Osborne has chosen a beautiful moment—when, in a country town, the red light of evening catches the tops of the houses in a street—for his "Cherry Ripe" (300). Very delicate and complete is Mr. Bright Morris's "The Mill Dam" (314). Neither the "St. Swithin's Summer" (350) of Mr. David Murray or the "Shiplake Hill" (367) of Mr. Alfred Parsons, though each is accomplished, is quite up to the highest level of either of these distinguished painters. Mr. Arthur Hacker's large "My Lady's Garden" (358), which holds a place of honour, is spoiled by its bad, raw colour. Mr. Yeend King's "The Orchard" (526) deserves notice, and Mr. Hope McLachlan's "October Storm" (567) comes near being very fine indeed.

Some of the best pictures at the Institute come under none of the categories yet considered. Mr. Reginald Arnold's girl in brown fur (226), and Mr. Percy Bigland's "Miss Catherine Holt" (55), in white satin and white fox, are among the few good three-quarters-length portraits. A brilliant sketch by Mr. James Clark is "Bride of the Bedouin" (246). What has happened to Mr. John Reid, whose manner of painting becomes more and more unruly and eccentric? As far as we can judge, Mr. Reid now paints wholly with the palette-knife, and the result is maddening, so evenly is the very good balanced by the very bad. His harbour-piece (8) has an excellent background, but the waves in the foreground are the very worst we ever saw. Again, in "His Poll was kind and fair" (593) the rich blues are most enjoyable, and the fisherman's head stands out with great solidity, but the painting of the foreground is positively criminal. Will no one present Mr. Reid with a set of brushes? An ideal head of a woman, peering through a mass of dark and shining leaves, is Mr. Henry J. Stock's "Ivy Fantasy" (417). M. Fantin-Latour is an artist for whose powers we have very great respect; but we do not fathom the meaning of his "Songe" (512), a sort of Sir Noel Paton group of fays and fairies floating about over a prostrate dreamer in a forest. We have kept two entirely delightful pictures for the last. Mr. Dollman has done nothing better than his "Content" (549), eight well-groomed donkeys who have strayed into a little wilderness of silvery thistles, and are having "a rattling good time" there. The tones of the buff sand, the pale thistles, and the rich brown of the asses are admirably rendered. Mrs. Adrian Stokes deserves great credit for her "Waiting for Santa Claus" (639), a comfortable infant, which has just been washed, toasting itself in front of the nursery fire, hemmed in by towels. The textures and the reflected lights in this little composition are given with a rare feeling for beauty.

RECENT CONCERTS.

THE announcement that Messrs. Novello have this season discontinued their Oratorio Concerts at St. James's Hall has left the Royal Choral Society practically in undisputed possession of this field of music. On the principle of the survival of the fittest this is, perhaps, as it should be; yet it cannot but be regretted that no regular series of oratorios should be given during the winter in any smaller concert-room than the vast amphitheatre of the Albert Hall, which is but little fitted to works demanding delicacy of detail rather than breadth of outline. This was felt on last Wednesday week, when the Royal Choral Society opened its season by a performance of Berlioz's Faust. Although the work has by this time become such a favourite with London audiences that it now takes a recognized place in the repertory of the Choir which Mr. Barnby has so admirably trained, those amateurs who remember its revival at St. James's Hall some years ago, under Sir Charles Hallé's conductorship, could not fail to be struck by the lessened effect it produces when performed in the overgrown Kensington concert-room. For this no blame rests with either conductor or performers. In every respect the performance was excellent; but Berlioz's masterpiece depends so much for its charm upon his admirable orchestration, and the music for the solo voices demands such delicacy of nuance, that much must of necessity be lost when the work is performed in a hall where no orchestral playing can properly be heard, and where solo voices lose half their individuality in the immense space they have to fill. With some of Berlioz's works this would not be so much felt as with the Faust, and it might be worth Mr. Barnby's consideration whether a performance of either the "Messe des Morts" or the "Te Deum" would not be successful at the Albert Hall. Difficult as both works are, his fine Choir would do ample justice to them, and both were designed by the composer for performance upon a larger scale than the Faust. The solos on the 25th ultimo were taken by Mme. Albani, Messrs. Iver McKay and Henschel. Apart from a tendency to over-emphasis—a fault which is excusable at the Albert Hall—Mme. Albani's performance was very fine. Mr. McKay sang well in the less dramatic portions of the work, but was unsatisfactory whenever the music demanded passion. Mr. Henschel is apt to sacrifice everything to declamation. The singer should not forget that the words may be enunciated at the expense of the notes. This is a fault which is very rare in England, where too often the exact contrary is heard, but it is one which frequently mars Mr. Henschel's performances. The chief honours of the evening rested with the chorus and orchestra, both of which did Mr. Barnby infinite credit.

The three concerts given by Señor Sarasate previous to his departure for America—whither all singers and instrumentalists seem nowadays to be bound—attracted immense audiences to St. James's Hall, that on the evening of the 1st especially being one of the largest ever assembled in the building. The programme included only one novelty—namely, an admirably conscientious and musicianly transcription for violin and orchestra by Saint-Saëns, of the Saraband from Bach's third Suite Anglaise for Clavecin. In addition to this, the Spanish violinist played in familiar fashion Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, Saint-Saëns's Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso for violin and orchestra, his own Fantasia on Bizet's Carmen, and no less than three encore-pieces. The orchestra, under the direction of Mr. W. G. Cusins, played the overture to Lalo's opera Le Roi d'Ys, a grave and dignified work, which, though it suffers from being disconnected from the opera to which it forms the prelude, created a more favourable impression than on its performance at the Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts last year. The programme also included Liszt's Poème Symphonique "Hungaria," an incoherent, wearisome, and ugly composition, the playing of which did not atone for the woful lack of interest of the music.

Last Saturday's Concert at the Crystal Palace opened with a novelty in the shape of a new Concert Overture, "Robert Bruce," the first orchestral work of Mr. F. J. Simpson, a composer whose name is new to amateurs. The plan of the overture is much on the lines of Liszt's "Poèmes Symphoniques," and betrays throughout the composer's foreign education. The work is mainly intended to depict, by the ingenious use of various themes, the gloomy and vengeful struggles and final victory of the Scotch hero whose name it bears, "local colour" being imparted by the abundant use of the national song "Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled." Mr. Simpson's strongest point is his use of the orchestra; in this he shows signs of promise; but the work on the whole is patchy in effect, and leaves an impression of cleverness rather than of originality. According to the Programme-book, the young composer has other orchestral works still in manuscript; it remains for him to show in them whether he is merely a clever student or a composer with something original to say. The rest of the programme consisted of well-known works. Herr Hans Wessely gave a manly and vigorous rendering of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, besides playing Wieniawski's hackneyed Polonaise, both of which performances deserve high praise. Schumann's beautiful Symphony in B flat, No. 1, and the Introduction, Apprentices' Dance, and Procession of Meistersingers, from Act III. of Wagner's Meistersinger, were played by the orchestra in a manner which left absolutely nothing to be desired. The vocalist was Mrs. Hutchinson, who was heard to great advantage in the setting of Moore's "There's a bower of roses by Bendemeer's stream," from Professor Stanford's Veiled Prophet, besides singing a rather uninteresting song of Massenet's.

At the Saturday Popular Concert at St. James's Hall on the 2nd, the chief attraction was Cherubini's fine Quartet in F, the second of the three posthumous works of the great Florentine master which were first heard in London last season, at Sir Charles Hallé's Chamber Concerts. The work was fully discussed upon that occasion, and the performance last Saturday confirmed the high opinion then expressed as to its merits. It fully deserves a permanent place in the repertory of Mr. Chappell's concerts, and every successive hearing will certainly increase the esteem in which it deserves to be held by musicians. Mme. Haas, who was the pianist at the concert, introduced another novelty, in the shape of a brilliant and scholarly Introduction and Fugue in E flat minor, the composition of Herr Alexis Holländer, a Silesian composer, who, though little known in this country, has recently acquired considerable reputation in Germany. The programme also included Beethoven's beautiful Sonata in A for pianoforte and violoncello, which was admirably played by Signor Piatti and Mme. Haas, violin solos by Leclair and Joachim, and songs by Mr. Henschel and Purcell. The vocalist was Mrs. Henschel. At the last Monday Popular Concert Signor Piatti introduced a Largo and Allemande by Attilio Ariosti, a composer of the early eighteenth century, who, though now forgotten, was a notable person in his day. Originally a Dominican monk, he obtained an ecclesiastical dispensation from his vows and devoted himself to music. Many of his operas were successful in Italy and Germany, and he was engaged in London, together with Buononcini and Handel, to supply new works for the Italian Opera in the Haymarket. His lessons for the Viola d'Amore, from which the pieces played last Monday were selected, were amongst his latest compositions. To judge from Signor Piatti's musicianly transcriptions, Ariosti's music cannot have possessed much individuality; it contains nothing to distinguish it from the similar compositions of a host of other contemporary musicians, though it is graceful and pleasant enough to listen to. In response to an encore, Signor Piatti played his own "Ossian's Song." The rest of Monday's programme consisted of such familiar works as Mozart's String Quartet in A major, No. 5, Schubert's Pianoforte Trio in B flat, Op. 99, and Schumann's Romance in F sharp major, Op. 28, No. 2, and Toccata in C major, Op. 7, for pianoforte solo. The latter were played, in her usual admirable manner, by Miss Agnes Zimmermann. The vocal numbers included Duets for Contralto and Baritone, by Dvořák and Mr. G. A. Thomas, sung by Miss Lena Little and Herr Max Heinrich. Mr. Thomas's graceful compositions were especially welcome; though slight in character, they are extremely beautiful, and full of a poetic charm which is too rare a gift in these days, when the purely lyrical faculty is becoming more and more scarce amongst composers.

Mr. Kuhe's second concert at the Albert Hall, last Monday, attracted an enormous audience, which filled every corner of the huge building to overflowing. The main attraction was the appearance of Mme. Patti, who, besides singing the Shadow Song from Meyerbeer's Dinorah, the Scena and "Légende de la Fille du Paria," from Delibes' Lakmé (the latter part of which she repeated for an encore), and the Scotch ballad "Robin Adair," gave, in response to the prolonged applause with which her performances were greeted, Bishop's "Home, Sweet Home," Hook's

"'Twas within a Mile of Edinboro' Town" and "Comin' thro' the Rye." The rest of the programme was more interesting than is often the case when the famous prima donna appears. Mlle. Douilly created a very favourable impression by her singing of the page's song from Les Huguenots, Sir Arthur Sullivan's "My dearest heart," and Tosti's "Venetian Song." Mr. Edward Lloyd gave a magnificent performance of the Scena "Lend me your aid," from Gounod's Reine de Saba, besides singing Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Come, Margarita, come," and "The Distant Shore"; and Mrs. Henschel won a well-deserved encore for her singing of Handel's charming "Lusinghe più care," from Alessandro, besides joining her husband in the Duet from Boieldieu's Nouveau Seigneur du Village, "Je vais rester à cette place." Mr. Durward Lely, whose singing has much improved since he left the Savoy Theatre, gave a correct, if somewhat tame, rendering of Handel's "Where'er you walk," and Mr. Henschel declaimed with due emphasis the rather uninteresting Scena from Wagner's Tannhäuser, "Blick' ich umher." Instrumental performances were given by Herr Johannes Wolf, who played the last two movements of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto and Wieniawski's Fantasia on Russian Airs, and by an efficient orchestra, under the conductorship of Herr Wilhelm Ganz.

MONEY MATTERS.

THROUGHOUT the week the short loan market has been easy, while the discount market has been firm, at about 4 per cent., or very slightly under. This is a not unusual circumstance in times like the present, when money, accumulated to meet demands that it is known will shortly arise, is lent out for a brief period, and depresses the rate of interest in the short loan market. The contrast is an indication, not of abundance in the supply of money, but rather that the supply will diminish considerably before long. In the present case it is known that there will almost immediately be a very considerable decline in the supply quite independently of any gold shipments that may take place. And as the matter illustrates the working of our banking law, it may be worth while to call special attention to it.

On the 11th of November—Term Day, as it is called—there are a great number of payments to be made in Scotland, with the result that, in anticipation of them, there is always an expansion of the note circulation. But when the banks issue notes beyond their authorized issue, they have to keep an equivalent amount of gold, and the law requires a sworn return to be made up every four weeks. This year it appears that the week in which the returns are to be made up falls so that the gold has not to be taken from London to Scotland until after Term Day—that is, until the cause of the expansion has actually passed away. The banks, of course, will not incur the risk and expense of conveying gold from London to Scotland and back again until the necessity arises, and, therefore, the withdrawals for Scotland, which usually take place about the beginning of November, are postponed this year until quite the middle of the month. It is estimated that about three-quarters of a million will next week have to be sent from London to Scotland, and, probably, within a week or two later it will all come back. Even if it be maintained that gold ought to be held by the banks for every note they issue, it is surely unnecessary to compel them to carry the metal backwards and forwards in this way. Would it not be simpler, and quite as safe, to accept a certificate from the Bank of England setting forth that the Scotch banks have deposited with it the amount of gold required to guarantee the convertibility of their notes?

The price of silver has advanced this week to 43½d. per oz., a rise of about 2d. per oz. since May, or not far short of 5 per cent. Besides the Mint, there is another large purchaser in the market. Some say it is the Austrian Government, and some suspect it to be a syndicate of American speculators. Whoever the purchaser may be, whether a Government or a group of great capitalists, the broker acting for him, it, or them, has apparently command of immense sums, for he seems capable of purchasing all the amounts offered to him, however large, and at advancing quotations. It is expected that Congress will, in its coming session, double the amount of silver which must be coined under the provisions of the Bland Act; therefore it is thought probable that some of the great American speculators may have combined to buy the metal cheap in the hope of selling it at a handsome profit, by-and-bye, to the American Mint. On the other hand, it is known that the Austrian Government has for some time past been negotiating with the Hungarian Government for the resumption of specie payments; and it is thought it may have the intention of adopting the single silver standard. Therefore, in the opinion of many, it is the Austrian Government which is buying. It seems hardly probable, however, that Austria-Hungary will adopt the single silver standard; for financially and commercially Austria and Hungary are so closely connected with Germany that it would be exceedingly disadvantageous to them to adopt a monetary system unlike the German.

this week. The course of the money market for the remainder of the year is uncertain. The speculation, in industrial securities more particularly, all over Germany is very wild; and, though the monthly Liquidation has been got over safely, the difficulties remain. In Paris those who suffered from the failure of the Panama Canal Company and the Copper Crash are still selling, while banks and syndicates in Paris, as well as in Berlin, hold immense quantities of Argentine securities which the public will not buy from them. The banking and building crisis in Italy still continues. And the state of affairs in the Argentine Republic becomes more threatening every day. The premium on gold is nearly 120 per cent. Indeed, private telegrams say that it is considerably higher. And it is evident that all the efforts of the Government to restore confidence have failed. The Government at the same time is putting a bold face upon matters. It refused the conditions required by the London and Paris bankers who had agreed to lend it eight millions sterling, alleging that it has money enough for all its requirements. And it has ordered the sale of 216,000 square miles of land at a minimum price of two gold dollars per hectare. This is an area considerably larger than all France, and somewhat larger even than the whole Empire of Germany. If the price is realized it will give the Government about 24 millions sterling. But then there are conditions for colonizing the land with certain nationalities, one-third English, one-third Italian, one-sixth Spanish, and the remainder French and Belgian, which are hardly likely to be complied with. Meanwhile, in spite of all these and other adverse circumstances, the general impression is that the new year will witness even a bolder and larger speculation than was seen this year. One other circumstance to be noted is that the speculation in South African land and mining shares of all kinds has practically come to an end, for the time being at all events. Buying has almost ceased, and few jobbers are willing to buy even a hundred shares.

There are rumours that the French Government is preparing a great funding and conversion operation. The unfunded debt of France is of enormous magnitude—over 150 millions sterling, if the Six Year and other bonds are included. It is said that the larger part of this debt is about to be funded, and that, to a large extent at all events, the interest will be provided by offering such terms to the holders of the Four and a Half per Cents as will induce them to convert. When the Five per Cents were converted a promise was given that they would not be converted again for ten years. The conversion, therefore, must be optional; but it is said that such favourable terms will be offered as are sure to be accepted.

It seems now as if the reorganization of the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fé Company would be accomplished after all. The Bondholders' Committee have offered to recommend the bondholders to accept, if the interest of the Income Bonds is made accumulative. It will be recollected that the bondholders are asked to accept a part of their principal in Four per Cent. Bonds, which are to be a first charge, and the remaining part, with compensation for the reduction in interest, in Income Bonds bearing 5 per cent. interest, but the interest to be payable only when and to the extent that it is earned. The demand now is that, if not earned in one year, the interest is to go on accumulating, and to be paid whenever earned subsequently.

The activity in the iron market continues, but the price remains little higher than a week ago, being just about 60s. a ton. The coal market, too, is exceedingly active, and the consumption of copper has likewise immensely increased. While the copper corner in Paris lasted, consumption was checked by the excessively high price, and, consequently, stocks accumulated. Since the copper crash the consumption has increased enormously. It is said, too, that the great banks in Paris, which took over the stock that had been accumulated by the Société des Métaux, have been selling on a considerable scale, so that the consumption has really increased more than the published figures represent. While such immense stocks continue in Paris, it is hardly likely that a material rise in price can take place; but business is exceedingly active and the shares of copper-mining Companies are again rising. In every direction evidence is thus being afforded that the trade improvement is steadily growing. Naturally the workpeople all over the country are insisting upon a share of the profits which their employers are making, and very generally an advance in wages is being conceded, in many cases the advance being on very large advances previously made. There is one demand of the workpeople, however, which is likely to lead before long to serious disputes, and that is, for a reduction in the hours of labour.

The Board of Trade Returns for October are highly satisfactory. Compared with October of last year the value of the imports shows an increase of about 9 per cent., and that of the exports of British and Irish produce and manufactures of about 10 per cent. In the exports the increase is very general. In the imports there is an increase in the quantities of tea, spirits, wine, and tobacco taken for consumption, as might be expected from the improvement in trade and the rise in wages.

MORLIOS AGONISTES.

(A Fragment.)

MORLIOS. CHORUS OF HECKLERS.

CHO. Our bosoms, like pomegranates at the prime,
Swell with the juice of questions. Wilt thou hear?
MOR. Ay, ask and fear not: heckle; fire away.
CHO. What if a man be doubly qualified?
MOR. One man, one vote; ye know the spoken word.
CHO. Three years gone by, what help in Parliament?
MOR. Nay but, lest age corrupt it, let it cease.
CHO. Is it for good that members serve for nought?
MOR. Yet better that they serve ye for a wage.
CHO. Home Rule, a word of many sounds, and dark.
MOR. Too dark to darken this our speech withal.
CHO. Us too it doth befog, leading astray.
MOR. Catch then the hare yourselves have set afoot.
CHO. Take we the land, and with the land the mines?
MOR. Buying or seizing them? Make clear your rede.
CHO. Nay, none but fools will market with a thief.
MOR. Hermes to help! what word hath 'scaped your lips?
CHO. Not ours the word, but Spencer's: blame thou him.
MOR. But, what if Spencer have recalled the word?
CHO. It skills not to recall it: truth prevails.
MOR. Eternal is it: have ye more to say?

CHO.

The little school children,
Whose charge is the State's,
Shall we cease from bewild'ring
Their breakfastless pates?
Will thou vote for their free education and saddle their grub on the rates?

MOR.

When those cannot pay it
Who should be amerced,
The State must defray it,
If worst comes to worst.
But private endeavour, it may be, should try the experiment first.

CHO.

Wilt grant to the pauper
Those rights he doth lack,
Rights held by the law pertinaciously back?
Wilt abolish the harsh regulation that separates Jill from her Jack?

MOR.

I would not the "Union"
Affections should kill;
Or forbid the communion
Of old Jack and Jill.
But I won't, if I know it, allow them to multiply paupers at will.

CHO.

Shall we find thee defying
Conservative fears?
Shall we see thee denying
The "wisdom of years"?
Art thou down on inherited office, and game to extinguish the Peers?

MOR.

Ye know I would mend them,
Or end them, our Lords;
But do ye intend them
Alone by your words?
Unfold me this thought, lest our purposes cross as the crossing of swords.

CHO.

Thou seest, thou sayest,
Misjudging us not;
Understand us thou mayest
To go for the lot.
Wilt thou go for the Monarchy, also, and send Crown and Sceptre to pot?

MOR.

Nay, reckon not those things
Within my design;
For destruction of most things
Though game to combine,
At destroying the Throne, as a statesman, I draw a provisional line.

REVIEWS.

POPULAR SONGS OF FRANCE.*

THE study of popular songs was comparatively neglected in France till the Commission of 1852. The fruits of that Commission were the collection of six large manuscript volumes, now preserved in the Bibliothèque Nationale. It is a pity that they are not printed. French Governments are usually liberal in these matters. Meanwhile, many authors—the Comte de Puymaigre, M. Bladé, M. Sébillot, M. Damase Arband, M. E. Rolland, and others—have collected and published the ballads and ditties, of which Gérard de Nerval had already given specimens in Sylvie. The Académie des Beaux Arts recently proposed, as a subject for one of its prizes, “Popular Melodies and Songs in France, from the beginning of the sixteenth to the close of the eighteenth century.” The relations of the musical accompaniments to Church and to general music were especially to be studied. The prize was gained by M. Julien Tiersot, whose book is now published. About the technicalities of the second part, which deals chiefly with music, we do not propose to speak; it is mainly matter for pure musical criticism. But the earlier division of M. Tiersot’s volume is of interest to all students of popular tradition. Unluckily, it did not come within the scope of the essay to discuss the relations between the popular traditional poetry of France and that of other European countries. That subject is nowhere so well illustrated as in Professor Child’s English and Scotch Popular Ballads, of which the sixth volume is now in the hands of subscribers. M. Tiersot is chiefly interested in French chansons. He briefly enumerates the various poetical influences, Greek, Roman, Celtic, Ecclesiastic, and Teutonic, which touched the country in early historical times, and he repeats much that M. Léon Gautier had already cited about references to popular poetry in the Carolingian era. He then reaches the old narrative ballads still extant in France; ballads, as it happens, by no means so numerous, beautiful, and interesting as those of the Scotch Border, of modern Greece, of Denmark, and other lands. He quotes the ballad of “Jean Renaud,” well known from M. Rossetti’s version, “John of Tours.” A fragment of a Scotch variant survives in a Scotch dance rhyme for children, a ronde, as it is called in France. Spain, Italy, Sweden, and Norway have also, as M. Tiersot remarks, their variants, and M. Gaston Paris (Revue Critique, i. 302) is inclined to believe in a Celtic original. Another widespread song, older than the Odyssey doubtless, is that concerning the husband’s return from the wars after long absence. Here, as elsewhere in his book, M. Tiersot seems to look on the “Barzaz Breiz” as more authoritative than most authors consider it. In the Breton version, as given in “Barzaz Breiz,” the returned warrior tells his brother, who has ill used his wife, “Were not this the house of my father and mother thy blood should redden my sword.” The Poitevin version is much more brutal, and probably more antique. The hero says to his mother:—

Si vous n’étiez ma mère,
Je vous ferai brûler;
Mais comm’ vous ét’ ma mère,
Je va vous étrangler.

Then we have the ballad of “Le Père Sévère,” “le Roy Loys,” who imprisons his daughter for a love affair—a very widely-spread ballad. The version in which the girl pretends to be dead, and is revived at her funeral by the lover, is given by Gérard de Nerval, and has a well-known Scotch variant. There are popular versions, too, of “Le Plongeur,” the diver who seeks the ring of the princess at the bottom of the sea. Then there is the story of the girl who avenges herself on a fiendish lover, the murderer of many other brides. This is the Scotch “May Colvin,” and tradition has localized the incident on the coast of Ayrshire. The supernatural, so very common in Northern ballads, is almost absent, M. Tiersot remarks, from the traditional poetry of France. We have St. Nicholas and his resuscitation of the murdered children, familiar through the form published by Gérard de Nerval; and there is the ghost of a murdered husband, who appears on the bridal night of his faithless wife; but we have no “Clerk Saunders,” no “Tamlane.” The fairies are conspicuously absent. But we must not forget the story of the rearisen mother who, in Provence as in Denmark, comes from the tomb to cherish her persecuted children. Acquainted with the Danish version through a translation by M. Xavier de Marmier, M. Tiersot is tempted to think that the piece is of Northern origin.

But the question of the original home of stories in verse, like this, is as obscure as the same question in regard to Märchen in prose. The Walloon version, from M. de Puymaigre, differs from many others in the good advice which the dead mother gives to the little ones. They are to behave nicely to their stepmother—

Et, si ell’ te demand’ qui t’a si bien appris, C’était ma pauvre mèr’ qui est en terr’ pourrie.

There is a variant, in which the children return with the mother to the tomb; another in which, when the dogs howl, the step-mother fears a new visit from the dead. In Brittany, by way of exception, the fairies, or korrigans, haunt the ballads, as they haunt the wolds. Other narrative ballads have nothing to do with knights and ladies, but with soldiers and unnamed girls, tales of seduction, child-murder, “old, unhappy, far-off things.” There are also reminiscences, though rare, of historical events; the song of an attack on a British frigate, captured

Par un corsair’ de six canons,
Lui qui en avait trent’-six, et bons.

This may be as apocryphal as the chant of the Mary Jane:—

’Twas the Mary Jane, off the coast of Spain,
In the year of the old French war,
Took the Belle Hélène, did the Mary Jane,
The great French seventy-four.

Says the skipper, says he, “Let us turn and flee,
Or we never shall reach the Nore,
For I stand on the poop of a merchant sloop,
While she is a seventy-four.”

and so forth, and so forth.

On the whole, popular tradition in France has very few lyric memories of French history. The apparent exceptions are usually false and modern. M. Tiersot recognizes that later investigations of Breton ballads do not bear out M. de la Villemarqué’s belief, that the Breton national poetry is full of history. Héloïse, Duguesclin, and other heroines and heroes are no more chanted of in Brittany than in Berry. “En vérité, le type de la chanson historique française c’est Malbrough s’en va-t-en guerre.” In France, then, we have nothing answering to “Auld Maitland” (if he is not apocryphal), nor to “Kinmont Willie,” “The Fire o’ Fren-draught,” “The Bonny Earl Murray,” “The Queen’s Maries,” and so forth—ballads where history, legend, and Märchen mingle in various proportions. But to account for this lack of historical reminiscence in France, as contrasted with Scotland, is a task not attempted by M. Tiersot. We do not speak here, of course, about the ancient lost popular lays which may have been the material used by the author of the Chanson de Roland.

On the topic of satirical songs M. Tiersot might have gained something, at the expense of brevity, from a study of a curious topic—satire as a social agent in the early Norse times, and at present among the Eskimo. The satirical song among these blameless Hyperboreans is at once a form of law and an expression of public opinion. To be satirized is the chief and most stringent kind of punishment. In France the popular satire is mainly turned against the curé, the old man who marries a young wife, and the jilt. From the Roman Comique M. Tiersot quotes:—

Mon père m’a donné mari.
Qu’est-ce que d’un homme si petit?
Il n’est pas plus grand qu’un fourmi.

This is rather like our nursery rhyme:—

I had a little husband,
No bigger than my thumb;
I put him in a pint-pot,
And there I bade him drum.

There is a hideous song of married life which contains the essence of a novel by M. Zola; the rhyme is entitled Mort du Mari. “The height of realism,” M. Tiersot calls this piece, which we do not remember having seen before, though MM. Bujéaud, Fleury, and Rolland appear to have published it.

Men pouer Jean est biein malade, Biein malade, Du merci.

Love songs and pastourelles are a much more pleasing class of rhymes, and very common. Here, at last, France has her advantage over the North—for the love lyrics of Burns, for example, are not, of course, in this category of anonymous traditional verse. The blossoming apple-trees, the messenger nightingales, the dove that coos “Marry, maidens, marry”—we have none of these. The Scotch peasant does not threaten the moon with his revenge because she sets so slowly and so tardily

Brings him to his marriage morn,
And round again to happy night.

Here is a pretty specimen:—

Au milieu d’une rose
Mon cœur est enchaîné;
N’y a serrurier en France
Qui puisse le déchaîner,
Si non mon ami Pierre
Qui en a pris la clef.

The well-known song, familiar in Canada, “En revenant des nocés,” ends this section. M. Tiersot then examines the various provinces of France in order, noting where the chanson flourishes most freely, and where it is dying out, as in Picardy, though it is pretty lively still there, for even English visitors have collected several examples. Normandy, according to M. Tiersot, manque d’idéal. Dance songs have degenerated with us into the rhymes of little girls “around the Merry May tanzey.” They are more vivacious in France. The bourrée is danced in Auvergne and elsewhere; the ronde is common, like “ring-songs, dances, ledes, and rounds,” in the old Scotland of Gawain Douglas. Then we have lullabies, very pretty, innocent ditties, and dirges, of which only Corsica offers really poetical specimens, though nothing like our lyke-wake dirge. Drinking songs are not really “popular”; like “John Barleycorn,” they are of literary origin, as a rule. So the opera of life ends with the dirge, and M. Tiersot approaches the technical and musical part of his accomplished and valuable work. But this, as Aristotle says, is matter for a different inquiry. It is, perhaps, a pity that he has said so little about the curious and widely diffused ditties on the numbers from one to twelve, ditties quite as common in England as in France, and of very great antiquity. M. Tiersot's book is even more valuable to the student of the history of music than to ballad collectors, though it is also of service in their pursuits.

NOVELS.*

FEW of our modern novel-writers are as clever in the use of the social microscope (tropically, so to speak) as Mr. F. Anstey. No one can handle it more skilfully, more keenly note the movements of the little being under examination, more sharply detect the motive of each small wriggle, or more humorously describe and classify the creature. This power of insight into human motive is the root of the matter when it is a question of writing a novel or a play. It is not all that is needed, but the possession of it gives an immense advantage. It has enabled Mr. Anstey to write one, at least, of the most amusing of modern books, and others not, perhaps, quite so successful. In The Pariah, his latest story, and the one which has probably been written with the greatest care and intention, we are more than ever struck by the sharp intuitive perception and the satirical balancing of judgment which make the author's writing such extremely entertaining reading. There is not a dull page—we might say, not a dull sentence—in it. But, probably because the story is meant to be of much larger scope than any previous work by Mr. Anstey, we are conscious of some deficiency. It wants a larger horizon. After the hours spent among Mr. Anstey's men and women (there are three closely-printed volumes, and no skipping is possible), one wants a blow out of doors and the sight of something big. We shall not spoil the interest of any reader by going into the story briefly, for the plot is in the title. Allen Chadwick is a Pariah, socially and domestically, from the beginning to the end of his sordid, dreary life. He is a sort of low London shopboy, neglected and uneducated until he is twenty-one, when his father returns from India unexpectedly enriched and takes him up. Almost immediately the father is married by a fashionable widow with small means and a family of beautiful, clever, highly-bred daughters. Into this milieu the poor untaught lad enters with amaze and delight, and asks no better than to be endured and allowed to adore. But the Chevenings cannot endure either him or his adoration; they act the cuckoo's part, and finally the bird who had the only real right to the nest is ejected and cast forth to die. This is not only an original story, but it is told in the most striking and original fashion, and with all kinds of amusing side issues. The girls are delightfully drawn, especially the bewitching Margot and the childish Lettice. Nothing that polish and finish, cleverness, humour, wit, and sarcasm can give is left out. What is left out is not so easy to define, but resolves itself finally into something like this—that the general view is that of the pessimist. There is pity for the hopeless Pariah, but there is not sympathy. He sinks into his miserable grave, and we make haste to forget him, as every one else about him did. There is no wider horizon for him than his own dreary existence. We are never made to feel that there is any response, any sympathy, any recognition anywhere, of his devotion. And yet so masterly is the delineation from the author's point of view that we are made to feel the same shrinking from Allen Chadwick that Margot Chevening did, and to admit the impossibility of enduring him. There is a positive atmosphere of sordidness about Allen in the book which makes one unwilling to rub shoulders with him. There is cruelty in it. There is no tenderness, even in the love between Margot and Nugent Orme, though Margot is both brilliant and sweet. Little Lettice is charming; but in time she will grow into another Margot. To feel thus is to treat Mr. Anstey's personages as if they were real, and an author can desire no more. But, as we have said, we are straitened in prolonged contact with them and a little wearied by their smallness.

The story of Randall Trevor, such as it is—and truly it is not much—is told by Mr. Herbert Earl with a certain antiquated formality not altogether unpleasant. The author moralizes too much—but that may be lightly passed by—and his idea of comic interlude is to give us long speeches by shrewish married ladies, and these can be skipped. His young ladies are the ladies who were young in the years when fainting-fits were fashionable and “glossy” hair was admired and sentiment had not yet been dismissed. “My lord, bestow your title on some one more worthy of it than I am,” cries Joan, with flashing eyes, when the parti of the county, the excellent Lord Weyland, proposes marriage to her. Lord Weyland had iniquitously offered to help Joan's brother by advancing sixty or seventy thousand pounds to clear the estate of mortgages, and that was enough for Joan. Randall Trevor, too, the hero, is more romantic than the heroes of to-day. He also desires, for the love of Joan, to help Squire Broadfield out of his difficulties, so he makes his solicitor buy up all the mortgages in an anonymous manner, and the Squire accepts with a light heart the assistance which comes, he informs his family, from “some unknown angel.” Such angels are, indeed, unknown in these days of reduced Consols. The story is laid principally in Oxford, and the sketches of University life and of one or two old dons are quite the pleasantest portions, though there is a little pain in finding a Fellow of St. Jude's, in answer to a request for explanation of something he had said, reply, “I expect I meant” so-and-so. The construction of a plot has been the author's greatest difficulty. Beyond a passionate lover, a willing maiden, and an obstinate old father or uncle he seems unable to get; and we have this situation played over several times. The old axiom in whist “when in doubt play trumps” seems to have suggested a mode of tactics. When the author gets into a tight place he kills a heroine. It dislocates continuity, and inflicts on the simple reader's attention a blow from which recovery is difficult; but eventually every one gets over it, including the lover, and the end of the second and last volume is gained.

People who write books for the young should be pedantically careful in the verisimilitude of their details. The juvenile eye is sharp to perceive discrepancies, and the juvenile judgment is implacable. We fear that the critic of tender years who finds Mrs. Callaway, in Miss Bramston's pretty story, A Pair of Cousins, referring to a relation as “your Uncle John's widow who married again. Dear me, I wonder if it's to say the poor creature's dead?” and discovers on the next page that the poor creature is Mrs. Callaway's own and only sister, further being named Emma and addressed as Maria, will resent it. The experienced have learned indulgence in such matters; but even they may regard the remark “his work was more amateur in execution” as ill-advised, both from the English and French point of view, and may doubt if association with even a very good artist in water-colour could enable any one to acquire the “instincts of a gentleman.” These are, after all, trifling blemishes; but it is a pity they should mar so pretty, pathetic, sensible a story as Miss Bramston's. The pair of cousins, Avis Goldenlea and Flower Callaway, are charmingly drawn, and not less excellent in their way are Jack and Nelly Mascarene. Jack's talk as a boy is well and truly done, consistent with his good-humoured, masterful, conceited attitude to his sister. The story, without being didactic, is wholesome and bracing. It will interest young persons, and their elders too.

The Makers of Mulling is the title given to a collection of four short stories, one of which at least seems to have appeared originally in a magazine. The first and the last, which are the most ambitiously conceived, are the least successful. In The Makers of Mulling, an attempt to reproduce to some extent the annals of a parish and to chronicle village politics, a canvas has been taken much too large for the artist's powers. “A Vendetta,” in venturing on the lines of tragedy, travels out of the reach of the writer's imagination. On the other hand, the two remaining sketches, “Worth While” and “Diamond Cut Diamond,” contain delicately touched views of quiet English country homes and sympathetic descriptions of the existences lived out in them. The innocent, protected, uneventful, often dull, but mostly useful, lives, sheltered under innumerable English parsonages present a small field for melodramatic writers; but, drawn with the simplicity Miss Coleridge has used in this instance, they have their attraction.

In whatever direction the talents of the writer who signs herself Mona may specially point, a perusal of To Him that Overcometh would suggest that it is not that of composing novels. So bewildering a coruscation of surreptitious babies, substituted heirs, marriages interrupted at the altar, baronets who are not baronets at all, and baronets who do not know they are baronets, wives who are called Miss, and Misses who have every claim but one to be addressed as matrons, we have seldom met. “Such welcome and unwelcome things at once 'tis hard to reconcile”; and, indeed, before the close of the volume (there is only one volume) it becomes impossible. Before attempting another story of English social life, it may be well for Mona to inform herself of such trifling matters as that estates cannot be at one and the same time entailed and at the free disposal of a testator, and that, under existing arrangements, two sisters cannot be known respectively as Mrs. Claremont and Lady Helen Dorrington, even though the latter has married a baronet.

HISTORIC ODDITIES.*

IN this volume Mr. Baring Gould republishes the first series—we see that another is to follow—of a collection of articles which he has contributed to various monthly magazines. They contain accounts of strange events or queer people for the most part of the last and present centuries. It is almost needless, seeing who wrote them, to say that they are generally bright and amusing, and that they are better worth reprinting than the majority of their class. Of course, a book of this kind becomes grievous if it is treated as a book—if an attempt, that is to say, is made to read it through continuously—but most of its contents will be found pleasant enough if taken in single doses. The first article examines such evidence as we have concerning the fate of Benjamin Bathurst, the English Envoy to the Court of Vienna in 1809, who mysteriously disappeared at Perleberg, a little town of Brandenburg, when on his journey homewards. In England it was generally believed that he was murdered by order of Napoleon, and the Times expressed this belief pretty plainly soon after his disappearance. Mr. Baring Gould has been led to the conclusion that, though Napoleon may have directed that he should be robbed of his despatches, it is probable that he was murdered against the Emperor's wish, for the sake of his money. He has gone carefully into all the circumstances of the case, and his paper is especially welcome because the short notice of Bathurst in the Dictionary of National Biography is anything but satisfactory. The attempt to make out that Elizabeth Chudleigh, the bigamous Duchess of Kingston, has been "hardly used" by her biographers does not strike us as successful; the subject is a well-worn one, and the treatment of it here is incomplete. No reference, for example, is made to what Frederick the Great says about her having got drunk at a ball at which he was present. Mallet's strange conspiracy—for a moment so strangely successful—against the Imperial Government in France in 1812 is told with much animation, and a later and somewhat heavier article exposes the utter groundlessness of the infamous charge brought against the memory of Louis XVI. of having tried to poison the locksmith Gamain. The adventures of Sophie Apitzsch are amusing reading. Sophie was the daughter of a Saxon armourer, who ran away from her father's house in 1714 to escape a disagreeable marriage, and, after wandering about for some time in man's clothes, was taken for the Crown Prince of Saxony by the owner of an estate about twenty-five miles from Dresden, and was treated accordingly. She received all the honours due to her supposed rank, and was loaded with presents. Her host was envied by his neighbours, who felt much as the Porkenhams did when Mrs. and Miss Nupkins boasted of their intimacy with the engaging Captain Fitz-Marshall. Sophie had a good time, chequered only by the anxiety of her host to get her for a husband for his daughter, until the bubble burst, and she was arrested by the police. The poor girl was whipped, and imprisoned for about two years. The last that is known about her is that on her release she took service with a baker. A story entitled "A Wax-and-Honey-Moon," which Mr. Baring Gould tells us he has embellished, is spun out rather too much, and the fun is decidedly forced. Of his other articles the narrative of the murder of the Countess Goerlitz at Darmstadt, in 1847, is perhaps the most interesting; while one or two more, such as his sketch of the career of the rascally Jew, Joseph Sness Oppenheim, the favourite of Duke Charles Alexander of Würtemberg, are also worth reading.

GRAPHICS.*

SOME twenty-three years have passed since Professor Culmann of Zürich, in his Graphische Statik, placed in the hands of engineers a novel process of calculation, the utility and power of which it would be difficult to exaggerate. It enabled problems which had required the elaborate application of algebra and trigonometry to be solved by merely drawing to scale a group of lines, in a manner so simple that the veriest babe or suckling in mathematics could do it, and even understand it. The well-drilled cadets of the Continental engineering schools readily assimilated the new method; but in England, where training in the theory of engineering lagged, and still sadly lags, a long way behind training in the practice of that art, we required to have the method rediscovered for us. It fell to Clerk Maxwell to find out for himself and to develop on lines of his own a portion of the process, though Maxwell's discovery was in some measure anticipated by the independent work of a draughtsman named Taylor. Maxwell's demonstration of the method of reciprocal figures, as he called it, was followed up by Fleeming Jenkin, who did good service in translating it into language intelligible to practical men, and in educating engineers to appreciate its value by showing them how it might be applied, with the utmost convenience and completeness, to determine the pulls and thrusts in the several members of a loaded roof or bridge. But the method of reciprocal figures was no more than a part of the science which Culmann founded, and which Cremona, Favaro, Maurice Levy and others have continued to build. English engineers are now fairly well aware of the usefulness of the graphic method, though probably few of them are alive to its scope. They have had before them for some years the excellent work of Mr. J. B. Chalmers on the Graphic Determination of Forces in Engineering Structures, not to mention several elementary manuals, as well as a treatise published in America by Professor Du Bois. It gives some idea of the attention the method has received, especially at the hands of Continental mechanicians, to remark that Du Bois, writing ten years ago, gives a list of some sixty or seventy books and papers on the subject. The Clarendon Press, we are glad to see, now promises a translation of Cremona's classical work; and we have here the first part of a comprehensively planned treatise by Professor R. H. Smith, in which the whole subject of graphical calculation is, or is to be, considered. The author's scheme is wide, so wide that he thinks it necessary to disclaim, in the first sentence of his preface, the intention of supplanting one's whole engineering library:—"This book will not enable the student of practical mechanics to dispense with the use of other books treating mechanics in the ordinary manner. If it did, it might be entitled 'Engineering Mechanics treated Graphically.'" It almost seems that Professor Smith had contemplated the supersession as possible, and had given up the idea with regret. He begins with "Graph-Arithmetic," showing how methods of linear construction may be used in place of common arithmetic to do sums in multiplication, division, proportion, and so on, and to find powers and roots. He goes on to "Graph-Algebra," and solves simple, and quadratic, and simultaneous equations with ruler and scale, by aid of a number of interesting artifices, some of which, we think, are new. Trigonometry, mensuration, and integration are then dealt with by graphic methods, and the author passes on to the most important part of his work—the treatment of vector quantities. This subject has been so well threshed out by the writers we have named as to leave little room for novelty, save in arrangement. Professor Smith, however, shows a considerable amount of originality, both in style and in subject-matter, especially in his discussion of the kinematics of mechanism. Coming finally to statics, the author treats in succession of the stresses in flat frames composed of struts and ties only, in flat frames containing beams, and in structures the parts of which cannot be taken as lying in one plane. These last chapters are valuable and suggestive, discussing as they do a number of more or less difficult cases which are omitted, or slurred over, in most of the text-books—such, for instance, as the case of loads applied at internal joints. The treatment is philosophical throughout; indeed, one may fairly complain that it is too philosophical. There can be no question of the author's mastery of his subject; but he strains too much after generality. Though the exposition is logical and exact, it lacks interest and simplicity. Any one who has a respectable amount of knowledge of the subject beforehand will find Professor Smith's book profitable, though not perhaps very pleasant, reading; but for a beginner we should pronounce it impossible. To our mind, a good part of the earlier chapters is hobby-riding—often curious and clever, but still hobby-riding. No sane man who had occasion to multiply or divide one number by another would do it by drawing and measuring lines, and it adds nothing to the value of a practical text-book to fill it with geometrical gymnastics. The graphic method is a good servant, but it has its own place. To torture it into universal applicability is only to discredit it. The best work is done by using more than one tool; and what an engineer really needs to know in this connexion is how to blend graphic processes with the ordinary methods of arithmetic and algebra, so that he may reach his result by the shortest and plainest way. We should have expected Professor Smith to lay more stress on this than he does, for he evidently knows what practical work is. His first chapter, on the use of drawing instruments, is in its way excellent; so is the treatment of kinematics—though why, by the way, is kinematics classed as a branch of dynamics? The plates, which fill a separate quarto volume, are admirably drawn. They are uniformly clear and correct; the only slip we have noticed is in fig. 83, where the resultant of two oppositely directed parallel forces is placed between the forces. This resultant, as it chanced by a rare exception, was found by calculation, not by graphic construction; so the author may plead that, if he had stuck to his hobby, the slip would not have occurred. Perhaps, too, it would not have occurred if he made a practice of dismounting oftener. Mr. Smith says that, if the present volume meets with a favourable reception, he will go on to publish a second part. We hope sincerely he will; for, though this first instalment is open on some sides to criticism, it contains more than enough of good matter to make one wish to see the work completed.

TRAILL'S STRAFFORD.*

ONE of the greatest, and beyond all question the most unjustly treated, both in his own day and by posterity, of all English statesmen could hardly have been committed to better hands than those of Mr. Traill. Although historical conscientiousness has made Professor Gardiner himself do much justice to Wentworth, and supply others with opportunity to do more, the tradition of injustice to the "wicked Earl" is too strong on the Liberal side to be easily made head against. And even on the other side little attempt has hitherto been made to counteract the calumnies and insults of two great Whig historians. Hallam, in whose veins ink ran instead of blood, and who wished that Shakspeare had not written the Sonnets, could not be expected to understand Strafford. Macaulay, who had no lack of generous impulses, seems to have found himself in such danger of sympathizing that he found it necessary (according to a well-known law of human nature) to insult. No blacker spot rests on even his memory than the use of the word "whimpering," in reference to the majestic constancy of the victim in that final scene when the lion was pulled down by the curs. On the other hand, Wentworth has been, on the whole, ill backed by his own side. Most of the Royalists of his own day were, it is well known, either afraid or jealous of him, and the great Royalist historian's attitude towards him was anything but friendly. The difficulty of championing his later action without condemning his master has constantly been felt by Tories; as well as, not less constantly, the difficulty of reconciling that later action with his own earlier conduct. And, lastly, it may be admitted by all that neither his characteristics nor his political views are easy to grasp offhand. Some, perhaps the majority, of prominent statesmen are intelligible enough, even if not very many details be obtainable about them; others, and Strafford is one, show but fitfully and indistinctly through a mass of their own and others' utterances.

Mr. Traill is particularly well fitted to deal with this hard case—first, because he is one of the not very numerous writers of the present day who understand what political argument means; secondly, because he is a thoroughgoing Tory; and, thirdly, because his Toryism is not in the least of the sentimental type. He is, if anything, rather hard on Charles (we do not refer to the abandonment of the Minister, as to which it is impossible to be too hard, but to other matters), and he seems to hint pretty plainly that Wentworth's esteem for Laud is a matter of some surprise to him. Here, also, the severity (which is specially unfilial in an alumnus of Coll. Di. Joh. Bap.) might be traversed. But these things are valuable because they clear Mr. Traill from that charge of approving out of fancy what he cannot approve out of reason, which is often brought against Tories of the modern school by those who cannot deny their possession of that reason.

The biographer has not attempted very much personal biography, though he has given a good account of Wentworth's life. The three points on which he has rightly spent almost his whole energies are—first, the problem of Wentworth's sudden "apostasy"; secondly, the question of his government in the North and in Ireland; thirdly, the circumstances of his trial and death. The first is, perhaps, that one on which Mr. Traill has spent most trouble, and on which he is most at variance with the usual authorities of different colours. It is, indeed, the crux of the whole subject. What was the real meaning of Wentworth's conduct in heading the Opposition up to the granting of the Petition of Right, and then in less than three weeks taking a peerage and becoming by far the staunchest and most formidable of the King's friends? Mr. Traill divides the possible hypotheses as follows:—

Either Wentworth was a sincere supporter of the claims of the Parliamentary party in the session of 1623, or he was not. Under the affirmative assumption there are three possible theories of his desertion of that party.

- (1) He may have been honestly convinced that his political views were mistaken, or that his political party was becoming dangerous to the State, and have abandoned it and them.
- (2) He may have yielded to the fascinations which Charles was unquestionably able to exercise, especially over a nature like Wentworth's, and have espoused his cause in the chimerical hope of being able to "accommodate the legitimate claims of prerogative with the rightful liberties of the subject."
- (3) He may have been simply bribed by the offer of power to recant a creed in which he still believed, and to become the hired soldier of a cause in the justice of which, at the time of his adopting it, he could have had no faith whatever.

Under the negative assumption that Wentworth was never sincere in his support of the Parliamentary party, we get the theory that

- (4) He may have placed himself at the head of that party in the session of 1623 with the deliberate intent of making himself troublesome to the King and his advisers, and wringing from their fears the preferment which he had failed to obtain from their good-will.

Of these Mr. Traill dismisses the first as the most favourable, but the least plausible; the second and third, especially the third, as inconsistent with Wentworth's character; and practically adopts the fourth, which, as he says, has been least popular. We are with him to a great extent on this point. Nowadays, as all men know, there are none but purely disinterested servants of the State. No one in our time would change a policy for the sake of place or power; would champion (let us say for example merely) Home Rule after denouncing and fighting against it; would adopt a "nasty" attitude towards the Government in order that the Government might be "nice" to him. But in those days men were less straitlaced, and, considering how many of the popular leaders were ready enough to serve the King, there is nothing very wonderful in the reverse process. Besides, though Mr. Traill (perhaps wisely, since the British public is not fond of paradox) does not put forward this rather paradoxical argument, a man less given to casuistry than most men were in the seventeenth century might argue that, if the King were misled by ill advisers, all means not absolutely bad were lawful to himself in order to leaven this ill advice or replace it wholly by good. But (and here we, as we suppose, differ with Mr. Traill) we are disposed to combine No. 1 to a certain extent with No. 4. We think that Wentworth was by no means unlikely to play the old and almost constantly successful game of "If you won't have me for a friend, you shall see what I can do as an enemy." But we think also that the ungrateful and irreconcilable conduct of the Commons (which Mr. Traill fully admits) after the concession of the Petition of Right may not only have served his conscience as a plausible pretext for fixing the precise time of the transference of his services, but may have seriously and genuinely alarmed him as to the course which his associates were pursuing. Mr. Traill explicitly admits, with a duly contemptuous characterization of those who do not, that the action of the Commons in relation to tonnage and poundage after the granting of the Petition was "disputable alike in justice, policy, and propriety," while the King had "reasonable grounds for being alarmed and natural excuse for being indignant," and that the limitation of the grant "incontestably lies outside the letter and the spirit of the Petition." Now, if this be so, no blame can reasonably be laid, even upon the strongest supporter of that Petition, for refusing to countenance the new departure. We do think that Wentworth's opposition was in great part due to ambition, but we think also that his desisting from it was in no small part due to an honest conviction that the Opposition was going too far.

With respect to Wentworth's conduct both as President of the North and as Lord-Deputy in Ireland there is less room for difference of opinion. The remarkable and manifold administrative ability displayed in it has never been seriously denied. With regard to its alleged highhandedness and arbitrary character, Mr. Traill takes a simple and straightforward line. Without condescending to the tu quoque, though the temptation to do so in the case of the Long Parliament must have been strong, he points out that almost all Strafford's acts were acts of "resolute government" merely, while the most disputable of them—the Mountnorris and Loftus cases (we think we should ourselves add that of Foulis, on which Mr. Traill seems, indeed, to look more lightly)—testify at most to a certain irritability of temper. The reckless calumnies of Macaulay as to the Loftus matter he dismisses, of course.

And now remains the question of the prosecution and sentence. We have said that Mr. Traill's disapproval of the King's conduct cannot be quarrelled with or softened. When Charles committed that hideous crime and blunder, he signed at the same time his own death-warrant and the death-warrant of the old Monarchy. And Mr. Traill is equally right in brushing away the preposterous contention that, if Sir Harry Vane's assertion was true, and if the formality of the two witnesses were overlooked, Strafford had technically committed high treason. But to our thinking the most valuable part of his book is the concluding paragraph:—

What the opposite principle of government would have developed into in Strafford's hands or in those of his successors is of course impossible to guess. "He thought," says Radcliffe, who knew him better than he was known to any other human being, that "regal power and popular privileges might well stand together; yet it being hard and difficult to keep the interests of the king and people from encroaching on one another, the longer he lived his experience taught him that it was far safer that the king should increase in power than that the people should gain advantages on the king. That may turn to the prejudice of some particular sufferers; this draws with it the ruin of the whole." The king did not increase but decreased in power, and has done so ever since; the people have gained, and have ever since continued to gain advantages on the king. And undoubtedly the "ruin of the whole" has not followed—at any rate with the speed which Strafford probably anticipated. In the history of nations, however the lapse of two centuries is but as the flight of a day. The time that has passed since the Revolution of 1688 is short indeed in comparison with the antecedent period during which our own and other European nations had been growing steadily in strength and cohesion under systems which, with whatever admixture of the popular element, were in the main systems of personal rule. Popular government has had as yet but a very brief history; and when we compare the seven generations or so of its existence with the ages which preceded its establishment, we cannot wonder that so many minds are recurring to the examination of abandoned political ideals, and that the once imposing train of believers in the divine right of Democracy is diminishing every day.

The imposing train will not like this; but it is strictly true, and, what is more, it is, we think, the first time that the argument has been succinctly and popularly put. The enormous capital which has been accumulated and bequeathed to popular government by government not popular in the Old World is as striking a fact as is the accidental and, in the nature of things, terminable, if not partly terminated, capital of another kind which has been enjoyed by democracy in the New. Whether in each case the heir will leave off squandering before it is too late θεῶν ἐν γούνασι κείται.

RECOLLECTIONS OF TRAVELS ABROAD.*

RECOLLECTIONS of Travels Abroad is a strange galimatias of adventures, theology, wanderings, lectures on the author's pet theories, on Don Quixote, on gambling, on the influence of gold and silver mining, on the rights of the negro, on emigration, Peruvian bark, "blackbirding," the value of the drama, colonial religion in Australia, colonial feeling in America, tattooing—the list is endless, and to transcribe it all would serve no useful purpose. The writer's style as well as his matter reminds us greatly of George Borrow, who, like Mr. Duffield, was a good Spanish scholar; and another point of resemblance between the two is, that Mr. Duffield, on whatever subject he writes, is always readable. Of our own colonies we have heard perhaps quite enough of late; but few men in England know anything whatever about what were once the Spanish colonies in South America, and of those few probably no one could describe them as well as Mr. Duffield. Most comic is his description of the sudden collapse of a filibustering company which he found in process of formation in London under the fostering care of a Señor Don Juan Badulaque de Gordaro—whose Spanish, to Mr. Duffield's practised ear, seemed to have a strong New York flavour—with the purpose of seizing the town of Guayaquil, conquering the Republic of Ecuador, and, by skilful manipulation of Ecuadorian stock, making a million sterling in twelve months. As a sample of the writer's personal adventures we cull the following characteristic extract:—

It is good for a man to be tried in a desert. I was once lost in a tropical forest at the foot of the Quindio Mountains, and felt as helpless as a land-crab up a tree. But no man need be lost in a wilderness of sand if the atmosphere is as sweet and inspiring as I found it. No despair is possible when your very bones are full of the power which is supplied by the Queen of the Air.

The Indians at the hut told me that I should not fail to overtake two men, adding some other word of which I took no notice at the time. I quickly made up to them as they were loitering along.

"Buenas dias, caballeros," I sang out in a cheerful voice as I drew nigh to the two horsemen.

"Buen dia," responded the oldest [sic] of the two, who was of saturnine complexion. There was no expression of human love in his face or voice. I became painfully suspicious that these two men were murderers.

Our talk became as polite as it was reserved. It was nearly all on my side. I could only learn what my fellow-travellers were made of by remarks which compelled them to look at me. I had never seen such ill-looking men.

"Have you any fresh water?" I inquired.

"Oh, yes! we have two bottles of sweet water."

"And have you, perchance, any good things on which to breakfast?"

"No."

They had nothing of the sort, as I knew full well.

"Then, if it will please your worships to join me at breakfast, I shall be happy to entertain you. I have some delicious meat-pies, onions from Lisbon, garlic from Chile, cheese and ham from Estremadura, the finest cognac from France, and the choicest cigars from the Havannah. On these we will refresh ourselves under the first rock we come to that gives any shade."

We reached a great rock, under the tropic of Capricorn, which the reader perhaps knows is very hot, take it when you will.

I spread a white diaper napkin on the sand, and began to make an ostentatious display of rare delicacies. Before inviting them to eat I offered the ruffians a thimbleful of the old French brandy.

They both praised the liquor.

"Well," I said, "I will give you this bottle of old brandy for your two bottles of water."

They jumped at the chance, and the exchange was made.

They drank freely of the smooth, silky, mild liquor, but very soon they fell asleep . . . and I could have cut their throats as easily as I sliced an onion. I finished breakfast, leaving the ruffians still sleeping, and off I rode, laughing, till I reached Calama, where I learned further particulars of them.

[They were subsequently shot in the market-place for murder and highway robbery, by order of the authorities.]

Mr. Duffield draws a strange, but we must confess to some extent a true, parallel between the Spanish colonies and our own with regard to their treatment of native tribes. We will not weaken his language by paraphrase:—

Some of my readers [he says (p. 141)] have, perhaps, been through the Vale of Daroca, in Castile. It was once famous for its vineyards and its innumerable happy people, who made a garden of it, from which there went up daily songs of joy and gladness. Behold it now, and you shall see a desolation that is precisely the same as that which I am trying to depict as existing at Potosi.

How came it to pass?

The same people who murdered the Indians in Potosi banished the Moors from Daroca, where there are now more empty houses than inhabitants, and more ruins than both put together. The Spanish colonists, in the one case, were consumed with avarice and greed and the lusts which come from selfishness; and the Spaniards of the mother-country, believing that God had forsaken them because trade was slack, and no silver came now from Potosi, thought to appease Him by sweeping their house clean of misbelieving dogs, hoping that He would send them back the good old days of prosperity and plenty. He has never taken the bribe—certainly joy and plenty for Spain seem further off than ever.

Would that I could see no likeness between the avarice and greed, coupled with ferocious cruelty, which once prevailed in Spanish silver colonies, and the avarice, greed, and cruelty to be found in some of our gold colonies! The likeness could not be more perfect if it were taken by the sun.

Given a sordid religion at home, we shall not fail to find a debased morality in the dependencies. As a proof of this, let me call attention to the following announcement which appeared in the London daily papers of March 11th, 1886:—

Letters received yesterday from the Australian station state that H.M.S. Diamond recently returned to Sydney after an absence of three months, during which she was busily employed in punishing natives in various parts for murders committed by them on British subjects.

At Normanby, where Captain Miller had been murdered, &c. &c.

We offer no comments of our own on this passage, but will let Mr. Duffield be his own interpreter. In a lecture delivered in the School of Arts at Mackay, the capital of the sugar industry in North Queensland, he said:—

Under the organized interference of Government, islanders have been brought from their homes who never understood the nature of the compact into which they were beguiled.

Under the same organized interference, many thousands of islanders have, by a legal figment, been enthralled in Queensland, after having been illegally beguiled from their homes by the very men whom Government had selected to represent it, and whose duty it was to hinder the doing of these things.

There never was any other reason than the apathy of the Queensland Government for the labour traffic so speedily developing itself, as it did, into a slave trade, except that there is, for sinful man, some diabolical fascination in man-hunting that exceeds fox-hunting, fishing, or shooting birds as much as real war exceeds a sham fight.

Not given to prophesying smooth things, evidently, is the man who could speak thus to a Queensland audience. Much of what he says also about English emigrants to the colonies is thoroughly worthy of careful consideration; for it is not every man who has seen the emigrant in his new home who has, like Mr. Duffield, the art of finding out what the conditions of life in the old country are which he especially misses and pines after when transplanted, though it is of enormous importance to us, as a nation, that we should learn these wants, and endeavour to the best of our ability to supply them. There is much delightful, and yet instructive, gossip on the emigration problem scattered broadcast throughout the book, especially, of course, in the chapters on Canada, where his chats with his self-made friend, "Job Spring," remind us strongly of Borrow. When speaking of America he points out that, in a very few years, if the rates of increase of the two races remain as at present, the President will be elected by the negro vote!—a result hardly contemplated by the most fervent of the Abolitionists of the last generation, but one to which Mr. Duffield seems able to look forward with complacency. When on the subject of America, by the way, we do not think that he need speak with such contempt of English people who do not exactly know what is meant by a "Mugwump."

We have left ourselves no space even for allusion to most of the best stories in the book; how, for example, at Potosi, Mr. Duffield "experienced the unpleasant sensation of a priest trying to convert me to the worship of the Virgin Mary"; how he voyaged for thirty days with "the typical woman who reads eight hundred new novels every year, who hates Tennyson, despises Browning, can't abide Charles Reade, and thinks Shakspeare to be a profane writer"; or how earthquakes in South American towns affect the softer sex; how he sailed round Cape Horn with a rum-drinking skipper, and how he lectured Don Felipe de Quiñones about Cervantes, while the poor man wanted to hear about manganese and hæmatite iron-ore; or how he drank in the words of wisdom of Job Spring, his "self-made" Canadian friend—the living example, as he called himself, of "the right thing to be done," about the most profitable of all investments, "human industry guided by knowledge." One more quotation and we have done:—

I think it is very likely that, if all, or nearly all, Scotch women could go to sea for a while, and get away from their fierce and narrow, and sometimes shallow, beliefs and thoughts about the future, it would do them good. As for the Scotch minister . . . it might do him good too. But I do not know. We once had one of these godly men on board a Cunard steamer coming home. He was very sick the first three days; but he was able to preach on the "Sabbath," and he took his text from the Revelations—"There shall be no more sea"! He spoke with great fervour, and looked forward to the time when he would be able to go about the world without passing through the perils and pains of the ocean, with real gratitude to the Giver of all good, and appealed to his hearers to come into a closer union with heaven that they, too, might enjoy a future in which there should be no more sea! The idea produced much sadness in me, because I am never thoroughly happy except when I am at sea. I was, however, much struck with the handiness of the Scotch minister, who proved himself able for anything; while he was thoroughly persuaded that the drying up of the sea was a part of the heavenly blessedness of the future; for had he not been very sick in the Atlantic?

SIR JOHN LOGIN AND DHULEEP SING.*

INDIAN medical officers are not always employed in curing gunshot wounds, inquiring into the origin of cholera, and making a post-mortem examination of the corpse of Shukram, who was killed in a free fight with the harassed and excited villagers of Fasādpur. Some doctors have become learned Orientalists, or have gained real distinction in political and diplomatic employ. Sixty years ago the Master of the Calcutta Mint, also a poet and a Sanskrit scholar, was a doctor. Another, for distinguished service in Persia, was made a G.C.B. In our own time, an excellent account of the countries between the Indus and the Oxus has been written by a Surgeon-Major, who, with the two Lumsdens, was for some months shut up in Candahar in the eventful year 1857. The subject of the bulky volume now before us was born in the Orkneys in 1809, had an early desire to go to sea as his fathers had done before him, then studied medicine, and, through the kindness of Chief Commissioner Adam, eventually became an Assistant-Surgeon in the Presidency of Bengal in the year 1832. Here he certainly did varied and interesting work. He had charge of native regiments, hospitals, jails, and dispensaries at Bolarum in the Nizam's dominions, at Calcutta, at Agra, and at Lucknow. In 1839 he accompanied the mission to Herat, when Major D'Arcy Todd succeeded Eldred Pottinger as envoy. Leaving that outpost when Todd abandoned it, greatly to the indignation of Lord Auckland who was forcible and feeble by turns, he got back to Lucknow and was then posted to the Horse Artillery during the second Sikh war. This career was, no doubt, creditable and useful. But it is scarcely a justification for a work of five hundred and fifty pages. Nor was it in the least necessary to publish every single letter which Dr. Login received from his superiors on leaving one appointment in order to take up another, in which the writers praised him for his kindness.

to the poor, his establishment of a new dispensary, or his exertions in the time of famine. Every officer, civil, medical, or military, who has done his duty in cantonment, camp, or cutcherry, possesses many such commendatory epistles. A little judicious compression and excision would still have left plenty of room for facts and anecdotes not unworthy of print. At Herat, for instance, Login met Mitford, the author of a Land March from Constantinople to Ceylon, and we can well believe that Shah Kamran, the nominal ruler of Herat, was a mere puppet in the hands of Yar Mohammed, who enjoyed a reputation for ferocity, treachery, and falsehood which very few Oriental despots could beat. But who could have informed Lady Login that Pushtoo, the common speech of the Afghans, was "merely a colloquial dialect or corrupt form of Persian"? The best linguistic authorities hold that, while Pushtoo belongs to the Aryan branch of languages, it has a distinct place intermediate between the Indic and the Iranic branches of that great family. It contains a large stock of words derived from Prakrit, and the declensions and conjugations have no analogy with the Persian. It may be added that, though the editor writes about India with the ease and familiarity natural to a lady who has had to manage a large household of native servants, the book is full of errors which are not the less annoying because they are trivial, and often consist in the omission of letters, the misplacement of dates, and the occasional havoc of native grammar and idiom. Incorrect spelling extends even to the name of the private secretary and the title of the State barge of the Governor-General. Dhuleep Sing in one page is said to have been born in 1831, and in another in 1838. The latter is of course the correct date. Kudrezadah should be Kadr-i-ziyadah. Essah Khoopsurat should be aisi Khub-surat. The Hindu family guest is Purohit, and not Porohut. Naraim is put for Narayan. By "Burnand, who is supposed to have shown great skill and energy before Delhi," General Barnard must be intended. And it is hardly fair to the character of Sir Henry Lawrence to reprint a confidential letter in which he angrily describes the late proprietor of a well-known up-country paper as "that scoundrel at Meerut." In fact, a lady and a widow who assumes the duty of an editor would do well to submit all proofs in such cases to some qualified linguist and candid friend. We should have liked a few more details regarding the wolf-child who evidently had been seen and examined when at Lucknow somewhere about 1847-8. The late Sir William Sleeman, our Resident in Oudh, once wrote a long report about several of these children who had, it was confidently asserted, been carried off by wolves in their infancy, and who were not devoured, but brought up with the cubs and adopted their habits. Sceptics whom Niebuhr had taught to reject the story of Romulus and Remus, have always wanted to know how the children escaped being eaten up on their first arrival at the wolf's den, and by what process of evolution they managed to eat and thrive on raw flesh instead of mother's milk. That some strange beings of this sort covered with hair, running on their hands and feet with callosities at their knees, uttering no human sounds, and much given to scratching and biting, were really seen at Lucknow by credible witnesses, Englishmen and Englishwomen, there is no reason to doubt. Whence they came is another question. They were generally asserted to have been captured by some villager or native Sowar (rider) on the edge of the jungle. And they either died in captivity or were said to have escaped to the jungles again.

These and other anecdotes of life at large military stations have, however, little to do with the principal object of this work. Lady Login, while she has no excuse for Dhuleep Sing, who has "made a base return for great kindness," has somehow persuaded herself that there is something to be said on the other side. And Colonel Malleon has written six pages to prove that Dhuleep Sing has suffered great wrongs, and that the English Government or the British public, or both, ought by generous concessions to bring him back to the fold. For Sir John Login's share in the Maharaja's early training and education there is nothing to be said but praise. He was entrusted with the care of the deposed Prince by a Governor-General who knew how to select his subordinates, and how to guide, support, and control them where necessary in the management of delicate and difficult affairs. The Maharaja was soon taught to ride and to shoot; his taste for music was developed; he was carefully removed from all the baneful influences of the zenana; he was brought up with young Englishmen, and yet he had about him his faithful and trustworthy native attendants; he went to the hills in the hot season, like a Viceroy or Lieutenant-Governor; his means were ample; his legitimate fancies were not checked; and he became a Christian on mature reflection and by patient study of the Scriptures, without the slightest attempt on the part of any adviser, lay or clerical, to mislead his judgment and influence his choice. There are, we have said, several letters in this book that we might have been spared. Of the correspondence, familiar and confidential, which passed for more than six years between Lord Dalhousie and Sir John Login we should not wish to lose a word. The guardian of the minor was practical, fair, and judicious in his recommendations. Very few were rejected by the Governor-General. Lord Dalhousie thought Dhuleep when he went to England in 1854, too old for a public school, and he did not favour the idea of making him a Talukdar with an estate in the Deyrah Doon. But in all that concerned the young Maharaja's best interests Lord Dalhousie was always the generous protector and the watchful friend, very different from the man who has been depicted as always hankering for more kingdoms to conquer and more Rajas and Nawabs to depose.

Still, it may be urged that, with all this kind and conciliatory treatment, Dhuleep Sing was ungenerously used. His allowances, it is said, were not in proportion to his rank. His just expectations were not fulfilled. No attention was paid to his repeated requests for a settlement of his claims on the attainment of his majority; and so on. To a plea that, after one invasion of our territories by the Sikhs and two sanguinary campaigns, we were bound to have restored the Punjab intact to the minor, in whose interests we had set up a sort of Regency, it is difficult to answer except by a smile. This argument was fully considered after the crowning battle of Guzerat, and was disposed of by Lord Dalhousie in one of his masterly and exhaustive manifestoes, which is reproduced in this volume. It is too late now to reopen a decision which was accepted as final, just, and politic by the Ministry, the Parliament, the public, and the press. And those who recollect the state of the Khalsa army previous to 1845, the fierce rivalries of claimants, the bloody feuds, the violent deaths of weak or dissolute rulers one after another, may be inclined to think that, if by any freak of policy any successor to Ranjit Sing had been placed on the throne, he would, whether Dhuleep Sing or any other prince, have not occupied more space than is given to those kings of Israel or Judah who reigned three months, and then slept with their fathers. Putting aside this silly claim to the restoration of the Punjab—about as reasonable as a gambler's request to have his stakes returned when the throw had been unfavourable—and a strong hankering after the Koh-i-nur diamond, we have only to consider the simple facts of Dhuleep Sing's position, allowances, and pension. At every annexation of territory, and after the deposition of any Raja, there has always been some difference of opinion on this head. At the close of the first Mahratta war, the ex-Peshwa received a pension of eight lacks of rupees, while a rival got seven and a half. The allowances to the King of Oudh in 1856 were fixed at 12,000*l.* a month, seeing that though a very bad ruler over his subjects, he had never been disloyal to us. For the prospective sovereign of the Punjab no such pleas could be urged, so it was resolved that a sum of not less than four, and not more than five, lacks of rupees should be set aside for the support of the Maharaja and other relatives and connexions who had any claims at all on the Government. Of this sum, 25,000*l.* a year was, after his majority, regularly paid to Dhuleep Sing to spend as he chose. He was also informed that while 15,000*l.* of the above was a personal allowance, the Secretary of State was willing to invest in Indian stocks, in the name of trustees, a sum sufficient to yield a yearly interest of 10,000*l.*, making the total of 25,000*l.*; and this investment, which would not have been less than 200,000*l.*, he was to be at liberty to dispose of by will. In addition to the above provisions, money was advanced out of accumulations during minority for the purchase of landed estates, and we have it on excellent authority that at various times subsequently considerable sums were lent to the Maharaja, when in pecuniary difficulties, of which to this hour neither principal nor interest has ever been repaid. But though about the year 1860 Dhuleep Sing seems to have been ready to accept terms which were sufficiently handsome, and which had been fully considered by the late Lord Halifax when at the India Office, he very soon, like Oliver Twist, began to ask for more. And all the later chapters of this book are filled with groundless grievances about lapses and accumulations owing to the deaths of other pensioners, which the petitioner conceived that he ought to enjoy. There is also a vague mention of private estates belonging to Ranjit Sing which no one has ever been able to discover. Further, we have a claim for compensation for property burnt and destroyed by the Sepoys in 1857. It is sufficient to say that many scores and hundreds of British subjects lost property at that time, for which they have never dreamed of demanding any compensation. But the most full and complete answer to all this querulousness is really furnished by Dhuleep Sing himself. It is shown that up to 1871 he was perfectly contented. To use Colonel Malleon's own language, he was then the happiest man in the world. He had gone back to India in 1861, and did not find things at all to his liking. He calls it, what subalterns have often called it before him—"a beastly place." Then he did not like the natives at all. They "were liars, flatterers, and extremely deceitful." The explanation of all this ex post facto discontent and disgust is simply that, when no longer under the guidance of Sir John Login and Colonel Oliphant, he fell into the hands of bad advisers. An officer, now deceased, spent a good deal of time and money in the production of wordy pamphlets in which the policy and character of Lord Dalhousie were spitefully discussed, and the woes of the Maharaja were magnified and paraded. Readers may rest assured that Dhuleep Sing has no cause of complaint against any one but himself. He was never fitted to play the part of a sovereign. He had been sedulously trained to assume the character of an English squire. And had it not been for injudicious advice and his own recklessness and absurdity he might still be drawing his pension, making huge bags of grouse at Grandtully and of partridges at Elvedon, and living a healthy and honoured life, instead of wandering in foreign capitals, and becoming an object of derision and pity to all who remember what sterling advantages he enjoyed, and what kind friends supported and advised him for something like a quarter of a century.

BOOKS ON DIVINITY.*

THE author of Supernatural Religion is determined to have the last word, and, if the Bishop of Durham is willing to allow him that feminine gratification, no one else need grudge it to him. The present volume (it consists almost entirely of reprints) is marked, perhaps—we are not quite sure—by a slight diminution in acerbity of tone. The author, who tells the reader frankly that “he has not the courage of his opinions,” has apparently come to the conclusion that the “Apologist,” and even the “staunch Apologist,” is, after all, more foolish than criminal. But he is still oddly obtuse, and cannot, for the life of him, understand why the Bishop, or anybody else, should be angry merely because Dr. Westcott was accused of dishonesty. Why all this fuss over the morality of an Apologist? Even now he cannot leave poor Dr. Westcott alone, but gibbets his harmless statements in parallel columns, side by side with what he calls “The Truth.” The main feature in the Reply is the care with which the author has found it necessary to define his position. “The argument in the first part” of Supernatural Religion “is not that miracles are impossible—a thesis which it is quite unnecessary to maintain—but the much simpler one, that miracles are antecedently incredible.” The second part of the work was directed to prove that in any case the evidence for the Christian miracles is insufficient. The author was understood by many readers to hold that the Gospels did not come into existence till late in the second century. This, however, is a mistake. All he maintains is, that there is no distinct trace of their existence before that date. In order to support this proposition, he is obliged to lay down three canons of interpretation—that the mention of a Gospel by name is no proof that the actually existing Gospel of that name is meant—that the literal identity of a quotation with a passage found in one of the existing Gospels is no proof that the quotation is actually taken from that Gospel—and that any variation whatever is a tolerably conclusive proof that it is not. His method is drawn from the Nisi Prius Courts. In the case of documents which make such inconvenient demands on belief and conduct, no evidence can be admitted which “would be declared totally insufficient in the case of any common question of property or title before a legal tribunal.” And, lastly, those who remember this ancient controversy will recollect that the author seldom ventured any statement of his own. His argument generally took this shape. “Apologists” say so and so. Baur and others deny. Therefore, the point must be regarded as doubtful at best. For Baur was not paid for his opinion and Apologists are. This position, the author flatters himself, has not been shaken. In this precise form it is not easy to shake. If a gentleman chooses to argue literary questions by forensic methods, it would not be possible to convince him—for instance, that Lord Clarendon wrote the History that goes by his name; and if he thinks it worth while to maintain that what the Tübingen School doubted has been doubted, no one can well controvert him. Nevertheless, any one who reads Dr. Lightfoot’s Essays and the Reply will see that a good deal of shaking has been accomplished. It has been shown that the author personally is not competent to speak upon the subject at all, because he cannot translate with accuracy a single page of either Latin or Greek. This is no matter of mere pedantic quibbling, as he would have his readers believe. Unfortunately, the Fathers wrote in Greek or Latin when they did not write in Oriental languages. Unfortunately, also, the author made serious inferences and serious accusations on the strength of passages which he could not understand. In some of these cases he now confesses the errors of his ways, but some of his blunders he still hugs with all the affection of a parent; and one of the very worst, that about the “martyrdom” of Zacharias, still does duty in the Reply to prop up a fallacy. It has been shown, again, that the author fell into serious errors upon points of grave importance—the meaning of the Silence of Eusebius, for instance, and the use of St. Luke’s Gospel by Marcion (here let Dr. Sanday have the honour that is his due). Few readers will think that he holds his ground about Ignatius, or Tatian, or Papias, or Polycarp. The brief notice on the last-named Father in the Reply is a confession of utter rout. “It might have been expected,” the author says, “that Dr. Lightfoot would have proceeded to show what bearing the Epistle (of Polycarp) has upon the evidence for the existence of the Gospels, and their sufficiency as testimony for the miracles which the Gospels record.” The answer is obvious. Dr. Lightfoot showed that Polycarp, who knew St. John, was about thirty years old when St. John died, and that the teaching of Polycarp was identical with that of Irenæus. And accordingly it becomes incumbent on the author to show where, when, and how “the fervid imagination of the East” managed to give an entirely new turn to Christian doctrine in the period covered by these three great men. How sore the shaking has been we may infer from the author’s repeated protests that all these things are matters of detail; they do not signify at all; they do not affect the contention that, whensoever or by whomsoever the Gospels were written, they cannot prove the truth of a miracle. And so the author falls back upon his second line of defence, which he justly regards as impregnable. For, when he says he cannot believe a miracle, he makes a statement, not about miracles, but about his own mind. If he thinks he cannot believe, who shall prove to him that he can? Only, if a man really thinks this, he had better not trouble his head with early Christian literature at all. For the conclusion to which he will infallibly be driven is that the Church was founded by lunatics, or, as the author puts it, by the “fervid imagination of the East.” And this is a conclusion which requires a good deal of courage.

The relation between Christian dogma and psychology, ethics, and physical science has of late furnished the motive to many excellent books. In England the subject labours under peculiar disadvantages, for our philosophy has almost uniformly refused to look into the phenomena of the religious consciousness. Ethics, in particular, have, as a rule, been handled with very insufficient regard to that life which is undoubtedly the broadest and most striking manifestation of ethics in practice. Science, of course, has gone its own way, and will do so, until the way is found to end in a cul-de-sac—a consummation which is perhaps not so far off. Hence the investigator on the borderland between reason and faith has little to help him. No kindly hands have arranged the material, supplied the terminology, and pointed out the way. For these reasons it is premature as yet to look for our modern Summa Theologiæ. A handful or two of striking analogies may be gleaned; but the time for thorough comprehensive synthesis is not yet. Books may be suggestive, even profound, but not methodical. It is from this point of view that the reader must approach Canon Maccoll’s Christianity in Relation to Science and Morals. If he has any sympathy at all with the writer and his theme, he will find it an admirable book, full of good thought, set out in a pleasantly rhetorical style. It consists of a set of lectures on the Apostles’ Creed, originally delivered in Ripon Cathedral—aimed, therefore, at a popular audience. Canon Maccoll takes each article separately, and endeavours, not to prove it from Scripture—though this is sometimes incidentally done—but to show exactly what it means, to meet moral and intellectual difficulties, and to bring each point of the Christian faith, as far as may be, into relation with knowledge derived from other sources. Thus he is led to speak of the Existence of God, the Origin of Life, the exact meaning of Evolution, the nature of Miracles, the influence of Creed on Character, the Atonement, the Church and its relations to non-episcopal communions. On all these subjects he has much to say, and says all well. The little book abounds in striking phrases. “Freedom is opposed to force not to mental certainty.” “Darwin’s explanation merely states facts, it does not account for them.” “If the revelations of physical science had preceded those of moral law, what a pandemonium this world would have become.” “Talk of the mysteries of Faith! Why we cannot move a step without stumbling against some mystery of science.” These are pregnant sayings which are developed with great ability. Perhaps the least satisfactory portion of the book is that in which the author treats of the Atonement. It is a great subject, not easy to handle in limited space, and it may be that Canon Maccoll wished on this account to make points rather than to present a complete view. But he seems to us to do something less than justice to the theology of Anselm, Aquinas, and the Reformation. If we understand him rightly, guilt is the subjective sense of guilt, punishment is the result of the violation of self-acting spiritual or moral laws, and aims at reformation pure and simple. But now guilt if purely subjective is an illusion; self-acting laws cannot be dispensed with, and it is no kindness to relieve a man of penalties that are intended for his good. Hence the notions of expiation and satisfaction seem to disappear. Canon Maccoll's "rationale of the innocent suffering for the guilty" could not, therefore, fail to be unsatisfactory, because on these premisses no rationale can be made out. This is the more disappointing because the Canon dwells in a very instructive manner upon the Headship of Christ, a doctrine which has seemed to many theologians, from Thomas Aquinas to Dr. Dale, to afford the means, if not of solving, at any rate of understanding, this great paradox of faith. However, if there are those who do not quite think with Canon Maccoll here, there are doubtless those who do. We cannot take leave of his book with any other feeling than that of pleasure; and as the "Fallacy of Demanding Unreasonable Evidence" is once again being thrust upon the much-suffering reader, let us comfort him with these vigorous words:—"Trace to its last analysis the evidence on which repose the sanctities of domestic life, the inheritance of property, the right of our gracious Queen to the throne which she adorns. . . . The whole edifice rests in every case on the unconfirmed veracity of a single woman."

Mr. Beet's Credentials of the Gospel is the work of a Wesleyan divine, who is already favourably known by his Commentaries on the Pauline Epistles. It forms the Fernley Lecture for the present year. It is much to be desired that the institution of lectures of this kind (modelled apparently on the Bampton) should spread still further, so that at stated intervals each, at any rate, of the more powerful communities should select its best man, impose upon him some serious intellectual task, and furnish him with adequate means for its completion. The result could hardly fail to be considerable, not so much, perhaps, in actual discovery as in educating the several communities and familiarizing them with the contents and attitude of modern thought. Mr. Beet's task is to prove the credibility of the Gospel, and he fulfils his duty in a series of eight sections or lectures. In the first he states his problem and describes his method. The second sets out the testimony of the human conscience to the truth of the New Testament. The third deals with the witness of nature to the existence of God. The main stress of the argument is laid on the problem of the origin of life, which Professor Huxley admits to be insoluble, though Haeckel thinks it may be explained by spontaneous generation in mid-ocean from two to five miles below the surface. The fourth insists upon the unique power of Christianity in evoking, sustaining, and directing social progress. The fifth asks by what secret Jesus has set this power in motion, and finds the answer in the Atonement and the Resurrection. The sixth is directed to prove the historical truth of the Resurrection. If this be denied, then "a delusion has saved the world." It is curious that Mr. Beet does not, except in this indirect form, insist upon the proof furnished by the existence of the Church and the substitution of Sunday for the Sabbath. The seventh lecture deals with a priori objections to the Resurrection, that miracles do not happen, that the progress of the Gospel in extension has been so slow that its origin cannot reasonably be regarded as Divine. The eighth and last is recapitulatory. Upon the whole, the argument on which Mr. Beet relies to prove his thesis is the saving grace of the Gospel, the perfect adaptability of the complex scheme of salvation to the equally complex needs of human nature. What he means by the Gospel is the whole deliverance of Wesleyanism, and what he aims at is to comfort a community of believers with the assurance that their faith is not in vain. Experimental knowledge is the solid foundation, which is supported by history and cannot be undermined by physical science. So regarded the book will be read with pleasure and profit, and will be valued the more highly for being the work of a commentator rather than of a polemic. For, after all, Mr. Beet's great point is the great point. The Church will be judged, like everything else, by results, and, if she can convert the wicked man, Materialism is false.

Dr. Belcher's Life of Mr. Robert Brett of Stoke Newington was well worth writing. It exhibits all the fidelity and sympathy that we expect in a monument raised by one devout physician to another. As regards the inner life of his subject, Dr. Belcher has exercised a laudable reticence; but we have here an admirable portrait of Mr. Brett as he was known to his friends and the outside world. It is the picture of a devout English layman of the middle class—we might say of a typical churchwarden—devout, generous, practical, and energetic, with considerable force of speech, and some facility with the pen. His income was always modest, because, like many other medical men, he chose to regard his profession rather as a priesthood than as a trade, yet he managed to get no less than six churches built. He was an uncompromising advocate of a movement that found many antagonists, and his figure was often seen through the dust of battle. But fifteen years have elapsed since he was laid to his rest, and the infamous riots at St George's-in-the-East and St. Matthias' can now be judged with calmness. Many even of his old opponents will be thankful for this opportunity of learning what Robert Brett really was, and many a hardworking professional and business man will recognize in him a kindred spirit.

In the new volume of the "Men of the Bible" series Canon Rawlinson narrates the history of the Kings of Israel and Judah, from Rehoboam to the Babylonian captivity. In so small a volume on so large a period a certain aridity of style is inevitable; and, as the Bible order is strictly followed, the reader is constantly being carried across from the Northern to the Southern Kingdom and back again. It would have been a great gain if Canon Rawlinson could have set the example of a less confusing arrangement. The book is written by a master of the subject, and all the information to be gathered from the Bible, from inscriptions, and from modern research, is here brought together, succinctly, yet fully and clearly. No better handbook could be put into a student's hand.

We have to thank Mr. Bindley for a good edition of one of the most interesting documents of the early Church, the Apology of Tertullian. Mr. Bindley has read up his subject thoroughly, and gives the result of his studies in a compact and serviceable form. Language, doctrine, ritual, and archæology have, each and all, received due attention, and for examination purposes, perhaps, nothing more could be desired. One or two defects might be noticed. Why, for instance, is there no note on caninæ tenebræ or diplomata? The tables by which divination was practised were not "tripods," but tables which rapped as they do for our modern Spiritualists. And some of the translations are carelessly expressed. For instance, cuius reus gaudet, "of which the criminal is proud." We trust Mr. Bindley will pursue his investigations, and attain to still more fruitful results. There is the subject of the Vulgar Latin awaiting him (it is surely misleading to speak of Tertullian's peculiarities as "patristic"); there is theological terminology, for "merit," "satisfaction," "free will," perhaps even "person" and "substance," are African. Again, there is the question of the exact legal position of the early Christians. No one sheds so much light on this point as Tertullian, who was himself a lawyer. Was there any special law that condemned the faith in itself? Certainly not in the Twelve Tables. The nostra elogia, of which Tertullian speaks, were the charges of murder, incest, sacrilege, high treason, witchcraft, and illegal combination, especially the last. These were quite sufficient for all the purposes of persecution.

"It is a very difficult thing," says Dr. Morgan Dix, "to preach the dogmas of the Church in such a way that the people shall take pleasure in hearing them, but not to preach them would be to push away the shaft of the column expecting the capital to stand alone without support." Dr. Dix has certainly solved the difficulty, for his book is very agreeable reading, and the dogmas are there. What he delivers is, to our English notions, rather an oration than a sermon, but the oratory is not too exuberant, and the speaker never loses sight of the real spiritual and intellectual difficulties of his hearers.

Mr. Bruster's Sermons to Children are rather long and hardly doctrinal enough, but they are picturesque, simple, and abundant in illustration and anecdote. They strike us as better adapted for the schoolroom or the fireside than the church.

Mr. Legh's Outline Addresses on the subject of Temperance will furnish speakers with material for many effective declamations. Mr. Legh is a little lukewarm on the Dual Basis, and a little hard on those who follow the example of Timothy.

In the "Frazer Prize Essays" Mr. Milne and Mr. Burgess, two Australian clergymen, criticize the bearing of Agnosticism on the moral and spiritual capacities of man with much acuteness and power. Another highly interesting little book on the same theme is Agnostic Fallacies, by the Rev. J. R. Howatt.

We have received also a new volume of Mr. Exell's Biblical Illustrator on St. Luke; To Meet the Day is the quaint and rather misleading title of a series of short meditations, accompanied by appropriate bits of poetry, for each of the red-letter days of the Christian Year, and a few others. It is recommended by the well-known initials A. K. H. B. The Lesser Hours of the Sarum Breviary—Prime, Terce, Sext, None, and Compline—in English; Wall's History of Infant Baptism, vol. ii., the new issue of the cheap and excellent "Ancient and Modern Library of Theological Literature"; and Child Thoughts on the Christianity of the Nineteenth Century.

COURTHOPE'S POPE.*

ALTHOUGH, by its position, this volume is the fifth in the series of ten to which it belongs, as a matter of fact it concludes and completes them. To have published it before the correspondence appeared would have been inexpedient, because during the course of publication large additions have been made to that correspondence, some of which—for example, the new group of letters between Pope and Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough, printed in the Eighth Report of the Royal Commission on Historical Manuscripts—materially facilitate our right comprehension of the (to use Mr. Courthope's adjectives) more "thorny and intricate" of the Pope problems. It is useful, moreover, to recall to mind that the new volume is not a separate biography, but a biography designed to accompany and supplement Pope's works and letters. In such circumstances, many points which, under different conditions, would require treatment at length, are, of necessity, either wholly omitted or only touched briefly, because they have already been sufficiently discussed in the introductions or notes to the poems to which they more properly belong, while long extracts from letters, defensible enough where the correspondence is not printed at length, become wholly superfluous where that correspondence is at hand, and can be easily referred to. Mr. Courthope has not neglected these preliminary obligations, and although the votaries of that "lean and flashy" manner which so often passes for lavish local colouring may complain of his style as a little constrained and over-cautious, moderation and accuracy are not popular errors, and there can be no doubt that in this particular instance his conception of his function is a judicious one. Especially, since so much of Pope's personal history is contained in his letters and the notes to them, is he wise in electing to dwell longest upon the purely critical questions connected with Pope's work. Himself a poet and scholar of distinction, and, in addition, a poet and scholar strongly in sympathy with his subject, he is, above all, qualified to appraise Pope's position as a writer. Those parts of his book in which he has addressed himself to this task are the most accomplished and the most instructive of his pages, and his final chapter upon Pope's place in English literature will probably set the critical tune for many years to come. In his estimate of Pope's character he has endeavoured to imitate the excellent example of Johnson—an example which, "dans le siècle où nous sommes," can never be too frequently followed—and to make the study of the writer's work his main business, in preference to moralizing upon his defects as a man. Hence there is but slender discussion of contemporary scandal in Mr. Courthope's book, nor will it bring great gain in this direction either to Pope's admirers or his detractors. As regards the poet's relations with Wycherley, his deplorable finessing is, indeed, enforced by the publication from the originals of Wycherley's ungarbled letters. On the other hand, the new light thrown upon Pope's dealings with Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough tends, in a measure, to clear his character. With these exceptions, that character remains no better or no worse than we are accustomed to believe.

Pope's manipulation of his correspondence with Wycherley is, to say the least, extraordinary, or, to speak more accurately, would seem extraordinary in any other person. As it appeared in 1735, and as it is reprinted in Volume I. of the present edition, its effect is to convey the impression that, in the written intercourse between a precocious boy and a septuagenarian rake, the younger writer, in virtue of his critical sagacity and superior intelligence, at once acquired and continued to maintain an ascendancy over his correspondent:—

He rebukes him for the vein of flattery in which he addresses him; criticizes his literary work with relentless frankness, and at the same time bears with patience the petulant outbreaks of the vain old man. On the other side Wycherley, who is represented as at first receiving Pope's criticisms with deference and gratitude, gradually grows peevish under his plain speaking, and at last openly exhibits his resentment against the poet by upbraiding him with his failure to redeem the promise of a visit.

This accurately summarizes the state of the case as hitherto repeated in Pope's biographies. Unfortunately, it turns out to be wholly at variance with fact. Wycherley's letters, or most of them, are preserved at Longleat, and Mr. Courthope's careful transcripts, now published for the first time by the kindness of the Marquess of Bath, show that Pope not only suppressed large portions of them, but arranged them with his own in such a way as to produce the effect he desired to suggest. In the original letters now given the position indicated above is reversed. It is invariably Wycherley who deprecates Pope's compliments, not Pope who deprecates Wycherley's. So far from Wycherley resenting the criticisms of "his Dear Little Great Friend," he receives them with composure, and, instead of complaining of the poet's neglect to visit him, adjourns, with endless variations of excuse, his own journey to Binfield. Mr. Elwin appears to have always had a suspicion about these Wycherley letters, and, with the originals before him, would in all probability go as far as his successor, who is clearly inclined to believe that those of the old dramatist's epistles published by Pope in 1735, for which no vouchers are now forthcoming, were simply concoctions by Pope himself. More than one of the suppressed passages of the new Wycherley letters, it may be added, contain references to Captain Steele, of the Gazette and Tatler.

With respect to the famous character of "Atossa," Mr. Courthope has already, in his Introduction to the Epistle "of the Characters of Women," done much to discredit the notorious story that Pope received 1,000*l.* from Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough to suppress it, and he had further given his reasons for believing that, if Pope had published it during his lifetime, he would have declared it to be the character of another person. The story is too long to tell in detail; but, from the new series of letters from Pope to the Duchess which Mr. Courthope now prints, it would appear that, whatever the present her Grace made to Pope, there is no evidence that it was accompanied by any specific conditions as to the suppression of the character, and the fact that Pope had inserted it in the edition of the Moral Essays, prepared for press just before his death, goes far to support this hypothesis. Mr. Courthope's further conjecture that, in publishing it at all under the circumstances, Pope intended to give out that it was the portrait of Katharine, Duchess of Buckinghamshire, who was already dead, is a plausible one, and will probably be accepted as satisfactory by all who are not prejudiced by the poet's intricate mystifications against any suggestion of his occasional good faith.

In his Life of Addison in the "Men of Letters" series, Mr. Courthope has already treated at some length the much-debated episode of another character-portrait, that of "Atticus." In the present volume he adheres generally to his previous verdict, and, notwithstanding the story told by Pope to Spence, holds that the lines were never sent to nor seen by Addison. The matter is a difficult one, and might well baffle even more skilful inquirers than Mr. Courthope. Much of the evidence is based upon Spence's Anecdotes, and Spence is no more infallible than most reporters of ana and contemporary conversations. Moreover, in many cases he must have related not so much what was true as what his informants desired to have believed. Mr. Courthope is probably right in referring to Tickell's translation of Homer as the determining cause of Pope's animosity, and he is also right in holding that such "open warfare" as that involved by Pope's sending the verses to Addison is not in Pope's manner. But, as it seems to us, he infers too much from the absence of reservation in what he twice calls Addison's liberal praise of the Iliad in the Free-Holder of the 7th May, 1716. All Addison says is this:—"The illiterate among our Countrymen, may learn to judge from Dryden's Virgil of the most perfect Epic Performance: And those parts of Homer, which have already been published by Mr. Pope, give us reason to think that the Iliad will appear in English with as little Disadvantage to that immortal Poem." Considering that in May 1716 a fair proportion of Pope's Iliad had been published, that it had been received enthusiastically, and that his poetical reputation was already high, this is scarcely what, in these days, at all events, would be classed as "liberal praise." Nor, on the other hand, can we quite see why, supposing Addison to have seen the verses, we should look for evidences of reserve. On the contrary, if Pope's view of Addison's character be the right one—and Mr. Courthope admits it to be correct in some, at least, of its characteristics—his natural timidity would surely prompt him to conciliate the man who (as he was aware) had got the terrible character of "Atticus" in his pocket.

It is, however, the disastrous feature of these time-honoured controversies that their seductively insoluble character has a tendency to prompt hypotheses, most of which Mr. Courthope, giving in compressed form the results of long reflection, has doubtless considered and discarded. Happily his book does not depend for its interest exclusively upon the elaborate examination of those minor details which are the stock-in-trade of the biographical "snapper-up of unconsidered trifles." It is strongest where strength is most needed—upon its critical side. Mr. Courthope's observations upon the formation of Pope's early style; upon the Essay on Criticism, which he has the courage to rate higher than most modern critics; upon the Rape of the Lock and its mock-heroic forerunners, in which connexion it may be noted that he says a deserved good word for Boileau's Lutrin—fill only a few out of many admirable pages in his work. But the cream of the whole is contained in the concluding chapter, which covers not only the long-echoing contest between classic and romantic—between Johnson and Warton—between Bowles and Byron, and Campbell and Roscoe—but also contrives incidentally to very prettily confute Cowper's absurd dictum about Pope's "mechanic art," and to leave Mr. Matthew Arnold on the horns of an uncomfortable dilemma as regards his decision, in Ward's English Poets, that Pope was "a classic of our prose." It is impossible, however, to attempt any serviceable summary of a chain of reasoning which is already sufficiently close-woven. As a tail-piece to our account of this able and most valuable biography, we shall do best to quote verbatim the author's final summary of his argument:—

The net result, then, of the quarrel between the classical and romantic schools seems to be this: that, in so far as the Lake poets and their successors revolted against the excessive restrictions placed upon the imagination by the misapplication of Pope's critical principles, they were in the right; but that, where they sought to overthrow his method of art, they were in error. This is proved alike by the solid and enduring pleasure produced by Pope's poetical works, and by the failure of the romantic poets, when working exclusively on their own principles, to satisfy the requirements of artistic unity. The main principle that governs Pope's poetical method is that poetry consists in the imitation of Nature. The leading rules that may be gathered from his theory and practice seem to be the following. Poetical conception must be natural: in other words, whatever subject is chosen must give scope for representing some general idea of Nature in one of the well-established forms of the art of poetry. Execution must be natural; that is to say, all parts of the poem must conspire to reproduce the idea of Nature as a rational and intelligible whole. Language must be natural, in the sense that it must reflect the ideal nature of the subject in metre, without any appearance of mannerism and affectation. Where these conditions are satisfied the poem, whatever be its particular order, will be a good and legitimate poem, and will exemplify the truth of Coleridge's aphorism: "Finally, good sense is the Body of poetic genius, Fancy its drapery, Motion its life, and Imagination the soul that is everywhere and in each; and forms all into one graceful and intelligent whole."

CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA.*

THE fourth volume of Chambers's Encyclopædia goes from Dionysius to Friction, and contains several articles of very contemporary interest. There is "Evolution," for instance, a thing which all men are expected to know better than by name in these times; and "Exhibition," which has been greatly to the fore all this summer. Professor Geddes gives some thirteen columns of very closely-packed information about the first. It will not be expected that we should do more than notice an article on so big a subject—one in which, moreover, what is matter of knowledge is so apt to melt imperceptibly into what is matter of speculation or opinion. Mr. H. Roscoe Dumville has simpler materials to deal with, and he supplies his readers with a brief sketch of the exhibitions which preceded the great show of this year. The editors appear to do their work on the Encyclopædia with the thoroughness they have shown all along. We notice few omissions, though there are some, and one of them is somewhat surprising in a book published in Edinburgh. There is an article—neither too long nor unduly laudatory to his character as a fighting man—on the naval Earl of Dundonald, but his father is hardly noticed. He receives one line in the article on his son, and it says nothing about him, except that he “beggared himself over chemical discoveries.” Now, although this is true, it is not the whole truth, and an Encyclopædia published in his native land should have done him better justice. The quality and tone of the articles are generally business-like and sound. We have raised the eyebrow of amazement at one or two. It is startling to be told that Emmet was only “an ill-fated Irish patriot,” and even to learn that his last speech “still thrills the reader by its noble and pathetic eloquence.” The Encyclopædia takes a remarkably tolerant view of the occasion on which the ill-fated patriot arrayed himself (how Irish!) in “a green coat, white breeches, and cocked hat.” It almost sympathizes with his mortification when the noble enterprise he preached in thrilling eloquence, and got himself up regardless to forward, ended (these disappointments will happen in Ireland) “in a few ruffianly murders.” Eloquence, green coats, breeches, cocked hats, and ruffianly murder—the ill-fated Irish patriot has them always with him. As a rule, however, the shorter biographical articles are done in a workmanlike shape, and made up, as they should be, of facts taken from respectable sources stated without comment. The virtuous practice of giving the authorities is not followed as zealously as it might be, and in that respect we hope to see an improvement.

The literary articles are, in several instances, of exceptional merit. Among those which are biographical not the least remarkable is Mr. W. E. Henley’s “Dumas.” Mr. Henley writes with a certain go not common in Encyclopædia articles, and praises his man in a hearty way. Criticism is mixed up with his facts, but it does not overlay them. Was it necessary to stop in the praise of Dumas in order to deal a backhander at Victor Hugo? We think not; but Mr. Henley is not of that opinion. Another readable article is Mr. P. Hume Brown’s “Erasmus.” Mr. Brown treats his man at proper length and with due sympathy. It is, however, a slight misstatement to say that the vice of the Ciceroniani was that they “set style above matter.” Erasmus surely attacked them because they chose pedantically to limit their Latin vocabulary, and so knock the life out of the living Latinity of the time. Mr. Brown may be right, in a way, in saying that Erasmus had the defect of his qualities, but then it must be acknowledged that his qualities had at least one very ugly defect. As an article on a literary subject by far the ablest in the volume is Mr. Saintsbury’s “Drama.” We have seldom seen more matter put into less space with greater art. Dr. Holmes discourses pleasantly of Emerson in an article which does not contain more than six insufferably epigrammatic sentences. We live in a universe in which it is idle to complain when we are told that a visit from Carlyle to Emerson, at Concord, would have “been a dangerous experiment in vital chemistry—hydrofluoric acid in a vessel of glass.” How smart! but what does it mean—except that Carlyle would probably have rebelled in an exceedingly self-conscious society of provincial priggery? Then why not say so? Among the many miscellaneous articles in the volume are several of solid merit. Mr. Lucas’s “Emigration” is all that could be expected considering the space at his disposal. A considerable part of the volume is devoted to the articles on England—English History (Rev. J. Franck Bright), Church of England (Rev. Dr. R. F. Littledale), English Language (Henry Sweet), English Literature (Professor Henry Morley). Dr. Bright’s historical paper gives a sufficiently clear outline of a subject which could not possibly be more than outlined in even much greater space than is allowed, or could be allowed, here. Dr. Littledale’s account of the history of the Church of England is somewhat fuller, and may be noted for its insistence on the continuity of the Church from the conversion of Kent. It would be almost foolish to complain of finding in Professor Morley’s article what we usually find in his papers on literature, and it must be acknowledged that these familiar features are less conspicuous than we have known them. On the whole, this fourth volume of the Encyclopædia rather more than keeps up the character of the book.

WOODLAND, MOOR, AND STREAM.*

THE author of this pleasant volume seems to be of the opinion of Private Mulvaney, in Soldiers Three, when he said, “I will name no names, and no more will I name places, for a man is thracked by a place.” He is anonymous, and he is most cautious not to name the haunts that he describes. It is, therefore, only human that we should take an ingenious pleasure in trying to track his steps. He describes himself as brought up, many years ago, in a very wild village in the North Kent Marshes, of the position of which he gives so many indications that we are almost sure that it is Lower Halstow. Certain features of the description, we confess, seem to point to a larger village or small town, and in that case it must undoubtedly be Queenborough. In either case it is a solitary place among the salt marshes near the mouth of the Medway, and, before the introduction of railways, about as solitary and as inaccessible a spot, and one as favourable to the education of a naturalist, as could be found in the length and breadth of England. A like mystery hangs over the name of the author of Woodland, Moor, and Stream, who writes like an educated man, accustomed to authorship. There is, however, no name on the title-page, and a prefatory note, signed J. A. Owen, states that these sketches “are from the hand of a friend of ours, a skilled workman.” But this may be merely a mystification. Mr. Owen’s friend, or Mr. Owen’s self, has no need to be ashamed of these graceful and graphic papers.

The Kentish village and its surroundings, as described in the first three chapters, are highly picturesque. Like so many better-known naturalists, the author began life by being “often missed at home,” while he was searching for peewits and curlews in the marsh, or tracking “the red hares flicking the wet off their hind feet as they sat on the mole hillocks,” or plunging into mud in search of the nest of the reed-wren. He made friends with the fishermen and their boys, and very soon rare things would be brought in for his amusement. One day a lad signed to him to follow him to his home, and, opening the door, pointed to something in the corner, with “There, mind he don’t nip ye!” “It was a Black-Backed Gull, one of the largest of his kind, quite capable, if I had given him the chance, of wrenching one of my small fingers off,” says the author. He soon learned to use a duck-gun himself, and to go out in winter shooting in the creeks. Of the scenes that this harsh and exciting sport led to in a land at that time positively swarming with bird-life, he gives some excellent pictures, especially of a sudden storm sweeping over the marshes, than which nothing could be more effective.

When he grew to man’s estate, our author transferred himself to Surrey, and the remainder of his volume contains careful and picturesque sketches on the moors and by the rivers of that county. An incident of otter-life is thus told in the words of a gamekeeper:—

“You know that gravelly bank, yonder? Well, one flood-tide we was hunting the rats that the water had drove out. It had drove the rabbits too; but it was rats we was hunting. We had got the ferrets and the dogs. The ferrets worked well, and went into all the holes as free as rain, till we come to a couple on the top of that particular bank. We turned ’em down, but they wouldn’t work them. All they did was to just poke their noses in and sniff, and then run round the holes uneasy like. The dogs, too, sniffed and scratched about strange like for them, quieter than they was used. We jumped about and poked into the holes, wondering why the ferrets would not go in. The river [Mole] was rushing almost bank-high to where we stood; when all at once something was heard whining like, and somebody said, ‘Look at that!’ It was a sight! For in the river was a fine otter. She had her cub by the nape of the neck, and was swimming across with him. It was hard work, but she tore through that rush of water from the weir in fine style. There was nothing above water but the alder stems on the other side, and she made for them. She was not twenty yards away from us the whole time. Well, when she reached them, she got her cub on to a limb, and left him. He did cry. And then we lost sight of her for a bit. The whine came again, almost close to our feet, and the dogs stood with ears pricked up and one fore-foot lifted, just quivering with excitement. She dashes out from the bank with a second cub. The dogs rush to the water’s edge, but they dare not plunge in, plucky as they are; for they knowed they’d be washed down and dashed into the limbs of the fallen trees that lay in and across the river. She got him over all right, and then they three made for the alder copse.”

Not less graphic are the anecdotes of the badger, especially one of a gentleman who put a fine specimen of this creature into an empty hutch, just over the one in which he kept his favourite doe-rabbit and her little ones. Next morning he was horrified to find that the badger had dug a hole in the floor of his hutch, and had descended into the apartments below, where he was found coiled in solitary splendour, and, as our author almost too graphically puts it, “very full of rabbit.” Back goes our naturalist to his native Kentish marshes to describe to us the heron—“Jack-Ern,” as the fishermen call him—and his haunts. A hunt after ring-ouzel in the bushes of black alder then succeeds, and so on to the end we are kept in pleasant rural company by one to whom the life of moors and wastes manifestly retains no more of its secrets than it did to Richard Jefferies. But for the example of that lamented writer, no doubt, such a book as Woodland, Moor, and Stream would never have been written. The very manner is often that of Jefferies, and it may not unfairly be said that all have got that seed now, and many can raise the flower. Not many, however, so sincerely, honestly, and cheerfully as the very pleasant companion from whom we are sorry to part at the end of this picturesque little volume.

CHRISTMAS BOOKS.

II.

ISMAY THORN’S A Flock of Four and Quite Unexpected (London: Wells Gardner, Darton, & Co.) should be read together, though the volume which is, in fact, the sequel is so deftly arranged that it can go very well on its own merits. The author’s cunning in depicting children as they are—neither too good nor too naughty, too priggish nor too savage—has suffered no change; and the “grown-ups” are, we think, even better drawn than is usual with this bright and engaging writer. The meeting between the Captain and his son at the railway-station has real dramatic force. It is only to be regretted that Ismay Thorn should have followed an evil example in depicting the harmless necessary circus-man as a monster of cruelty and greed. It should be added that the illustrations are much to the purpose.

With Lee in Virginia: a Story of the American Civil War, by G. A. Henty (London: Blackie & Son), will be hailed by our boys with the enthusiasm with which they always hail a book by Mr. Henty, knowing the fund of interest and amusement it always gives them. With Lee in Virginia is no exception to this rule. We cannot do better than describe the book in Mr. Henty's own words:—"It was impossible, in the course of a single volume, to give even a sketch of the numerous and complicated operations of the war, and I have, therefore, confined myself to the central point of the great struggle—the attempts of the Northern armies to force their way to Richmond, the capital of Virginia and the heart of the Confederacy. Even in recounting the leading events in these campaigns, I have burdened my story with as few details as possible, it being my object now, as always, to amuse as well as to give instruction in the facts of history." The adventures of Vincent Wingfield, the hero of the book, and his slave Dan add much to its interest and excitement.

Another contribution of Mr. Henty's to the amusement of young people is Tales of Daring and Danger (London: Blackie & Son), the first tale, "Bears and Dacoits," being perhaps the most thrilling. Being saved from getting killed by a bear only to get into the hands of Dacoits was certainly a case of "out of the frying pan into the fire." The title of "A Pipe of Mystery" tells its own tale, and "A Brush with the Chinese" is an exciting experience.

A third book by Mr. Henty, By Pike and Dyke: a Tale of the Rise of the Dutch Republic (London: Blackie & Son), is again one full of historical facts put forward in the form of a story, with a hero such as boys love to read about, and who, at sixteen, when hearing of the tyranny under which the Dutch were suffering exclaimed, "Were I a Dutchman and living under such a tyranny I would rise and fight to the death rather than see my family martyred. If none other would rise with me, I would take a sword and go out and slay the first Spaniard I met, and again another, until I was killed"; which sentiment he carries through his life, though, instead of being killed, he lives to be knighted by Queen Elizabeth, and marries the daughter of the Countess von Harp. Mr. Henty has certainly surpassed himself in the interesting manner in which he has set forth his tale of the rise of the Dutch Republic.

Captain, by Mme. P. de Nanteuil, translated by Laura Ensor, illustrated by Myrbach (London: Routledge & Sons), is a very pretty story of a dog, who, having been rescued from drowning by a sailor-boy called Yvon Yossic, attaches himself to his rescuer, and is the means, in return, of saving his life and that of his friends on more than one occasion. Captain becomes a necessary part of the crew on board the different ships in which his master serves, and shows not only extraordinary fortitude and courage, but great tact and good sense in his roving life, and learns many tricks. One, described as "authentic," is worth quoting:—"After the inspection, when about a dozen men were drawn up on the deck, Yvon would say to Captain, 'Fetch the caps!' Then Captain would run and take all the men's caps off their heads with his teeth, and carry them, one after the other, to his master, who, tying a thick handkerchief over the dog's eyes, mixed the caps indiscriminately together and put them into a heap. Then he said, 'Now give back to each man his own property!' and Captain, diving haphazard into the heap, would take each cap and place it on the head of the sailor to whom it belonged. Every cap bore the owner's number, and he never made a mistake." His powers of fighting and scattering the enemy are vividly described in the successful attempt his master and a handful of men made to rescue their comrades from "a hundred to a hundred and twenty" Chinamen who had taken them prisoners. "Captain, who had preceded them, threw himself into the midst of the enemy, biting, tearing, knocking them over, and scattering terror into their midst. Evidently they took him for a lion or tiger, the supposed lion soon occasioning such a panic among them that they disbanded and fled, escaping by climbing up the rocks, where they were still exposed to the fire of the revolvers. Those who were not hit disappeared." To any one, young or old, who is a dog-lover Captain will prove most attractive. The book has been very well translated by Laura Ensor, who has given us good English instead of French-English, and the illustrations by Myrbach, seventy-six in number, are full of force and life.

Earthquakes, translated from the French of Arnold Boscowitz by C. B. Pitman (London: Routledge & Sons), is a book full of all the horrors of that terrible catastrophe; also containing much instruction on it. It describes, besides seaquakes and deluges, the earthquakes in the island of St. Thomas, in Honduras, in San Salvador, the Lisbon earthquake, that in Calabria, in Ischia, in Andalusia, in the canton of Valais, at Mendoza, in the island of Chio, at Cumana, in the Strait of Sunda, and in New Zealand, with many awful scenes and incidents which, however powerfully they are brought before us, seem impossible to realize in this country.

Cooper's Leather-Stocking Tales, for boys and girls, are a collection of J. Fenimore Cooper's most attractive tales in one volume. It contains The Deerslayer, The Last of the Mohicans, The Pathfinder, Leather Stocking, and The Trapper. It would be futile to attempt any description of these old favourites; let those lucky boys and girls who do not already know them find out their charm for themselves.

In My Friend Smith: a Story of School and City Life, by Talbot Baines Reed (London: The Religious Tract Society), we find a book for boys such as only the author of The Three-Guinea Watch and The Fifth Form at St. Dominic's can produce. "My friend Smith" and his friend Batchelor will keep any boy enthralled from the time of the friends meeting at Stonebridge House, a school after Mr. Wackford Squeers's own heart, to the time when the reader has to part with them as prosperously settled in life. The illustrations, by Gordon Browne, are executed with great care and spirit, and are worthy additions to this fascinating story.

The Eagle Cliff: a Tale of the Western Isles, by R. M. Ballantyne (London: Partridge & Co.), contains many adventures of various kinds, beginning with a bicycle accident, going on with the wreck of the little yacht in which our adventurers were making a voyage to the Western Isles of Scotland, then dangerous studies of botany, over which two young people fall in love, fishing excursions, and a deer drive, all filled with stirring events and many accidents, and ending with a fire, in which all distinguish themselves by their powers of endurance and willingness to help in getting it under. The pretty love story, which adds to the romance of the book, comes to the general conclusion, "they were married," and, let us hope, lived happily ever after. There is a funny and really new adventure with that favourite animal of adventurous fiction, the bull, in which "a narrow open drain" and "a large cotton umbrella of the Gamp description," were the prosaic deliverers of the bull's victim, who, "Placing the umbrella in such a position that it came between himself and the bull, laid himself flat down in the drain. The opening was far too narrow to admit his broad shoulders, except when turned sideways. The same treatment was not applicable to other parts of his person, but by dint of squeezing and collapsing, he got down, nestled under the bank, and lay still. On came the bull till it reached the basket, which, with a deft toss, it hurled into the air, and sent the silvery treasure flying. A moment more and it went headforemost into the umbrella. Whether it was surprised at finding its enemy so light and unsubstantial, or at the slipping of one of its feet into the drain, we cannot tell, but the result was that it came down, and turned a complete somersault over the drain, carrying the umbrella along with it in its mad career. When the bull scrambled to its feet again and looked round in some surprise, it found that one of its legs and both its horns were through and entangled with the wrecked articles. It was a fine sight to witness the furious battle that immediately ensued between the black bull and that cotton umbrella! Rage at the man was evidently transmuted into horror at the article. The bull pranced and shook its head, and pawed about in vain efforts to get rid of its tormentor. Shreds of the wreck flapped wildly in its eyes. Spider-like ribs clung to its massive limbs and poked its reeking sides, while the swaying handle kept tapping its cheeks, and ears, and nose, as if taunting the creature with being held and badgered by a thing so flimsy and insignificant." We will leave it to the readers of Eagle Cliff to find out how the bull was finally conquered, and how its victim escaped.

The Story of Father Damien, by Frances E. Cooke (London: Swan Sonnenschein & Co.), begins at the very beginning of his life. He was born at Tremeloo, a village in South Brabant, and his name was Joseph De Veuster. "While still very young and full of hope for the years that were to unfold before him, diligent in his work at school, and interested in all that went on around him, there was a deep inner spiritual life within Joseph De Veuster, and a longing to keep clear and bright in his soul the spark of Divine light which his mother's teaching had led him to guard with reverence from his earliest years. . . . The stories of the saints and martyrs of old times, to which he and his brothers and sisters had listened in the evenings while his mother read, influenced him still. What could he do better, he asked himself, than follow their example, and afflict and mortify his body that so his soul might perhaps grow the more in grace?" He was intended by his parents to follow his father's occupation and enter on a commercial life; but his longing to be a priest overcame everything else, and in 1859 he was admitted into the Convent of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary at Louvain as a young brother of the choir, and took the name of "Brother Damien." At the age of twenty-three, by his own urgent request and special appeal, he was sent as missionary to the Hawaiian Islands. From that time, till he died of that fearful disease leprosy, amongst the victims of which he incessantly worked, his life was what as a boy he longed it should be, following the example of saints and martyrs. The account of such a life is one that ought to show our most thoughtless young people the full beauty of self-sacrifice, though one cannot expect many "Father Damiens" to come forward in this world.

The Achievements of Youth, by the Rev Robert Steel (London: Nelson & Sons), is a collection of short biographies of the early life of our most famous men and women "from various spheres of thought and life, to illustrate what has been accomplished by youths who diligently cultivated their powers and opportunities. Some of them may appear to be prodigies—overgrowths; but the most will be specimens of what others may become." This "series of examples" of the youth of our great men will encourage many a lad and young girl to go and do likewise.

Lost in Africa, by Frederick Horatio Winder (London: Sampson Low, Marston, Searle, & Rivington), is described accurately as "A Yarn of Adventure." Its hero behaves as a hero ought, gets through all his dangers, and is rewarded as he ought to be at the end of the book.

The Loss of John Humble; what Led to it, and what Came of it, by G. Norway (London: Blackie & Son), is a tale of a poor Swedish boy, John Humble, who, having lost his father, is looked after by his uncle, Rolf Humble, who volunteers to "take him to sea and make a man of him." John, accordingly, goes off with his uncle in his ship, the Erl King. The story is vividly told of his capture by Englishmen when he is looking after the boat which has landed his uncle and some seamen at Portsmouth, of his being taken on board the Hector, the brutal treatment he receives, the way he was saved and befriended by the captain of a Norwegian vessel, whom John serves faithfully until the captain dies, and at last of his return to Stockholm, and the welcome home he received. The book ends, as it should, with John's marriage.

Scout's Head; or, St. Nectan's Bell: a Tale of the Wild West Coast, by Frederick Langbridge (London: Warne & Co.), is a wild story of a brother and sister who have lost their mother, whose father drinks, and deserts them. How they fend for themselves, make friends, though a desperate villain and enemy does his best to ruin them in every way, and how they come out of all their misfortunes safe, and even gloriously, must be left to the reader to find out.

Sir Aylmer's Heir, a story for the young, by Evelyn Everett Green (London: Nelson & Sons), is a very interesting tale of a little boy whose mother is dead and whose father is a soldier. He is sent to live with an uncle, Sir Aylmer Desborough. When he arrives at his uncle's house he finds no one but the old housekeeper, who is too much perturbed to give him the warm welcome she should. However, the poor, lonely little fellow soon makes friends amongst the servants and the animals in the place, and also "He began to live in a world of his own, peopled by creatures of his own imagination, or by the heroes of the history or fiction he read." About a year after his arrival at his uncle's house his uncle comes home. Sir Aylmer is an eccentric, hard man, and it was not until after Eyton Desborough's father had been killed that he and Eyton made friends. The friendship once begun, it proceeds with rapid strides, and Eyton ends by not only becoming "Sir Aylmer's heir," but the delight and blessing of his life. Too often sad things are dwelt upon in children's books in such a way as only to narrow their sometimes too morbidly inclined minds; but in this prettily told story that danger is avoided.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE almanacs which the end of October annually produces in France are too curious and characteristic a product, and too different from anything which, at least to the same extent, is produced in England, to be passed over. They are all, or nearly all, issued by MM. Plon at the Dépôt central des Almanachs, though some of them have additional publishers as well; and, large as is the selection (some score or more) which we have before us, we think we are right in saying that the total is far larger, probably exceeding a hundred, and representing in title, if not in actual contents, almost every trade, occupation, and class of the population. In many of these there is no very particular interest for the English reader, though old experience may find a faint attraction in the discovery that, if the fat and venerable Triple liégeois does not now fall to pieces at the first touch, as he used to do, it is because he has run a kind of stay of iron wire through himself, which, indeed, supports his frame, but makes it almost impossible to open him; that Mathieu de la Drôme is as dangerously particular in his prophecies of weather at different times and places as ever; and that the Almanach astrologique, under the most horrific of covers, conceals a modest selection of scientific, or quasi-scientific, faits divers, which would do fairly for a Standard Reading-book. Some of the minor almanachs are also interesting, though it is rather difficult to be certain how much their contents vary from year to year. The Bonne Cuisine has some good old receipts, and is interesting because it retains the habit, now quite disused in English books, of stating the qualities, or supposed qualities, of the preparations as regards health. On the whole, the "Bon cuisinier" cannot be charged with taking too cheerful a view of his subject. This soup is "a delicious cate and the cause of a great number of indigestions; one must use it with reserve"; that "determines flatuosities"; another "will only suit robust stomachs." And we should like to give any one ten guesses as to the composition in regard to which, though it is allowed to be "restorative and stimulating," "It goes without saying that one must not give it either to children or to convalescents, or to irritated stomachs, or to sanguine temperaments, or to very nervous persons, or to those who are" never mind what. The ghost of Mr. Woodhouse himself may stare and gasp at being told that this awful preparation, this culinary corpse-reviver, apparently suited only to chalciferous persons or those at the point of death, is a very simple mutton broth with sippets in it. It is only a survival of this kind which shows one how little of a flesh-eating nation the French were till recently.

Among these numerous and ephemeral productions there are a few besides those which we have named possessing a certain attraction. The Almanach du savoir vivre is always amusing and pretty generally sound, one thing which it notes being specially so—that, whereas no one a very few years ago would have thought of passing a lady in the street with a cigar in his mouth, the misbehaviour is now quite common. Nor is it any answer that the lady would probably then have objected to smoke and probably now does not; for the action was a mark of deference to sex generally, not to particular taste. The Almanach des célébrités has some useful portraits of persons represented in the obituary of last year, as well as others. The Lunatique, the Prophétique, the Comique, the Catholique, the Scientifique, the Almanachs des jeunes mères, de la Mère Cicogne, des dames et des demoiselles, de la France, and others, each have their special appeal. But three—the Almanach du Charivari, the Almanach Grévin, and the Almanach pour rire—still, in the work of MM. Grévin, Mars, Draner, and others, retain some of the attraction which has long been possessed by Parisian caricaturists. This year we think the Almanach pour rire is the best of the three. The Almanach des Parisiennes, otherwise Grévin, is as full as ever of exceedingly plump and exceedingly undressed young persons; but the wit does not seem to us to have improved, and there are at least two jokes, with cuts to match, which are offensive in the highest degree—not amusing, not even immoral, but simply nasty and coarse beyond the limit of average scurrility and blackguardism. In the Charivari there is more fun, and cleaner fun, without any oppressive virtue. The young women of "Mars" have, as usual, the defect of being too much like fashion-plates, and of a singular want of expression; but they are not unappetizing. MM. Henriot and Draner, if not so pretty, have more "go" in them, and there is also verve in M. Tézier, who has a somewhat more antique style than most of the followers of Mars and Grévin. The Almanach pour rire is wholly by two of these artists, MM. Draner and Mars; nor has there ever, perhaps, been a better example of the latter's peculiar style than the first plate, "Départ pour la pêche aux crevettes." "Au bal de l'opéra," by his coadjutor, is, perhaps, the best thing M. Draner has contributed, though the "Fat au bal" is good, and the return of the bold cavalier who has ventured to the refreshment buffet at an official party, and returns in rags, cuffless, blacked as to the eye, his hair dishevelled, and so forth, is an excellent extravaganza in its way.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

LOUISA MAY ALCOTT: her Life, Letters, and Journals, edited by Ednah D. Cheney (Sampson Low & Co.), is altogether the kind of biography, reflective and self-illustrative, that is appropriate to the subject. Formal narrative or elaborate criticism would be equally out of place in a book that is mainly autobiographical. The author, through her Little Women and the companion stories, has long been known to a multitude of children of all sorts and growths. "Aunt Jo" is, in truth, everybody's Jo, and Mr. Cheney's book offers a renewal of intimacy with an old friend. The editor is to be commended for permitting himself nothing more nor less than the slight comment which the Journals and Letters of Louisa May Alcott require. "Much as Miss Alcott loved literature," he remarks, "it was not an end in itself to her, but a means." She laboured for the wants of her family, and her heart was wholly bound up in the domestic circle. This view is entirely supported by the evidence of the correspondence and journals. The self-revelation there offered is of the kind that biographers value most. Charming as is the self-portraiture of the stories, even more engaging and touching is the story of the struggles and victories of the brave, sweet-hearted woman as told by herself. Her education, in a circle of "transcendentalists" of whom her father was a prophet, appears to have been somewhat of the forcing kind, though there was plenty of healthy relaxation permitted. The journals, which commence early, are full of piquant entries, and suggest pleasant pictures of the family circle. We have glimpses of the ten-year-old child at the Harvard settlement of "Fruitlands," a miniature Brook Farm of Alcottian disciples, who practised vegetarianism and high thinking. "Pluck your body from the orchard; do not snatch it from the shambles," is a specimen of the "vegetarian wafers" used at Fruitlands. At the age of twelve an Emersonian worship was induced by a copy of Bettine's correspondence with Goethe, picked up while "browsing" in Emerson's library, and this led to sentimental letters addressed, but never delivered, to the Sage of Concord, and floral offerings, and playing the part of Mignon to the "Master," singing in "very bad German" under his window. Her juvenile journal has its shrewd touches of humour. When her father remarked, that while her sister's journal was about other people, "Louisa's is about herself," she makes the quaint admission "That is true, for I don't talk about myself, yet must always think of the wilful, moody girl I try to manage, and in my journal I write of her to see how she gets on." One thinks of "Aunt Jo" as nothing if not "practical"; but she had, it seems, her "sentimental period," was stage-struck and wrote dramas of various kinds, and made several essays in literature before she found the path to popularity. She was born, as she said, with "a boy's spirit under her bib and tucker," and there is plenty of "heart" and indomitable spirit in her letters. One delightful example, on the making of a bonnet, will be enjoyed by all men, though some ladies may think the subject too serious for jesting. Mr. Cheney's book is wholesome and enjoyable; a memorial worthy of the subject.

An agreeable sense of companionship is aroused by the Countess Cowper's record of travel, A Month in Palestine (John Bumpus). It is brightly written, and shows independent observation. Like the eminent traveller Dr. Shaw, the author studies the topography of the Holy Land in the light of Scriptural records, and her descriptions are well defined, readily realized, and free from needless detail. The maps and photographic plates are fairly illustrative of the voyager's route, though some of the latter are too dusky and too obviously pieced together for panoramic effect to be altogether attractive. There is enough of picturesque feeling in the writer to make pictorial illustration superfluous.

The reprint of Jane Eyre (Walter Scott) in the "Camelot Series," one of several recent re-issues of Charlotte Brontë's famous novel, deserves commendation on account of Mr. Clement K. Shorter's sound and discreet "Introduction." Too often are the young gentlemen charged with these cheap and popular reprints delivered of nothing but the loosest and most unpropitious gush. Mr. Shorter's notice of the author is just, well balanced, and sensible. His summary of the too-abundant books and articles on the Brontës is keen and judicial.

A noteworthy addition to the "Chandos Classics" is Gay's Fables, with Harvey's designs, edited by W. H. Kearley Wright, F.R.Hist.S. (Warne & Co.), the type and paper excellent, the engravings by Dalziel, after Harvey, capitally printed. Mr. Wright, as a Devonshire man of letters, has been naturally assiduous in his researches into the life and works of the Barnstaple poet. His Life of Gay embraces all that is known of the poet's career, and comprises a full account of such relics as the ingenious and comfortable chair, with its concealed drawer, and the piece of old oak from Barnstaple Church with the poet's name cut in it, dated 1695.

Sweet Singers of Wales (Religious Tract Society) is a volume of hymns by Welsh writers, collected and in part translated by Mr. H. Elvet Lewis, who interpolates an interesting selection with biographical notes of the authors. The poetic quality of the whole does not appear to be remarkable, and is far inferior to the works of Charles Wesley or Cowper and Newton. In the vernacular they must be, to judge from their congregational effect, much more moving. Simple, earnest, fervid in tone many of them are; but the poetic graces are neither striking nor numerous.

Nothing more perfect and lucid could be desired than Professor Tidy's science lectures for young people delivered last winter at the London Institution and now published under the title The Story of a Tinder Box (S. P. C. K.). The book is admirably illustrated, and the lecturer is a master of the art of exposition. He enables the reader to see and realize the experimental evidence with complete success.

Mr. F. Edward Hulme's Wayside Sketches (S.P.C.K.) is well adapted to young persons inclined to the study of nature and natural history. It offers a pleasant and excursive survey of the aspects of the country through the changeful seasons of the year, and is embellished with much poetical quotation and some good woodcuts. To write agreeably and in a light chatty style on such agreeable subjects as flowers, birds, and butterflies, is no arduous task when the audience addressed is young and enthusiastic. Mr. Hulme is a facile writer, and his information is generally accurate, his pictures of nature fairly true and impressive. He is himself guilty, however, of the iteration of dubious or baseless statements with which he charges other naturalists. He says, for instance, that the nightingale rarely arrives in England till well on in May, whereas it almost invariably arrives in April, and is exceptionally late if first detected in the first week of May. Then, again, he repeats the incredible statement that the song of the blackcap is "little inferior" to that of the nightingale, and apparently thinks it possible that a person with an ear could mistake the former for the latter.

The new volume of Travel, Adventure, and Sport from Blackwood (Blackwood & Sons) contains, with other good things, the late Sir Richmond Shakespeare's "Journey from Herat to Orenburg," a record of diplomatic enterprise and travel in the year 1840, that thoroughly repays reading at this date.

From Messrs. Macmillan & Co. we have new editions of Doctor Claudius and Mr. Isaacs, by F. Marion Crawford; Scenes and Characters, by Miss Yonge; Tom Brown at Oxford, and Dean Church's Bacon, in the series of "English Men of Letters."

We have also received a new edition of Mrs. Walford's Cousins (Blackett & Hallam).

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we cannot return rejected Communications; and to this rule we can make no exception, even if stamps for return of MS. are sent. The Editor must also entirely decline to enter into correspondence with the writers of MSS. sent in and not acknowledged.

THE TREASURY of SACRED SONG.

Selected from the English Lyrical Poetry of Four Centuries. With Notes, Explanatory and Biographical. By FRANCIS T. PALGRAVE, Professor of Poetry in the University of Oxford.

"* To offer Poetry for Poetry's sake has been the Editor's first aim in compiling this Selection, which is intended to be representative of the entire range of English Sacred Poetry. The brief biographies inserted will, it is hoped, satisfy the natural desire for some acquaintance with the main facts in the lives of those whose best and deepest thoughts are here presented.—From the PREFACE.

"A more delightful collection it would be difficult to conceive, and the fascination of infinite variety carries us forward from page to page. Mr. Palgrave's Anthology is a triumphant vindication of sacred poetry, and of his aim 'to offer such sacred song, and such only, as shall be instinctively felt worthy of the august name of poetry.'—Times.

"Mr. Palgrave's Anthology will at once become a standard volume."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"An admirable representation of all that is best in the field of literature which it covers."—Globe.

"The work adds another to the few books which are prized almost as personal friends by lovers of poetry."—Scotsman.

A SECOND EDITION, in 1 vol., at 6s., of

JOHN NEWBOLD'S ORDEAL. By THOMAS

PINKERTON. 6s.

The Spectator says it is "an unmistakably clever book, and, though it often recalls the literary handling both of Anthony Trollope and of Mr. W. E. Norris, it is an original book as well. By the few who know and love good work it will be found thoroughly enjoyable."

The Morning Post says:—"It is fresh, full of humour, never bitter in its satire. The writer's character sketches can best be described by the homely phrase, 'they are brimful of cleverness.'"

The British Weekly says:—"Not often in a season's reading do we come upon a story so clever as this. There is enough of such cleverness in Mr. Pinkerton's book to make him a reputation as a satirist. He will soon take a prominent place among the novelists of to-day."

The Whitehall Review speaks of "John Newbold's Ordeal" as "a novel of character, and written in an exceptionally happy vein."

THE GUILDHALL SPEECHES.

THE civilized world is perhaps not, even when its opinions are correctly reported, the very best judge on matters affecting the internal policy of England. It has been questioned (and, though we are not quite prepared to take the side of the questioners, we admit that they have something to say for themselves) whether lookers-on really do see most of the game in reference to the internal politics of another country. But the civilized world, and that portion of it which finds utterance in European bourses and newspapers, is, within certain limits, a capital judge of utterances about foreign policy. The approval which has been on the whole expressed—the disapproval of some Russian and French organs being, in fact, complimentary—in reference to Lord SALISBURY's speech at Guildhall last Saturday is a solid fact. The other speeches on that occasion were not as interesting as they have sometimes been, with perhaps the exception of Mr. BALFOUR's curious and characteristic deprecation of unfavourable criticisms from outside on the House of Commons. It is sometimes difficult (though we run the risk of having Mr. BALFOUR himself down upon us for saying this) to find much good to say of that House; but its worst enemy may admit that it has for hundreds of years had this faculty of inspiring a sort of jealous affection in its most distinguished members. Nor is their affection merely of that somewhat selfish, though by no means despicable, kind which made the Roman poet confess his desire Ut videare aliis fœda, decora mihi. They will have us admire, too, or at least abstain from blaspheming. Be it so; we can, at any rate, all of us hope that Mr. BALFOUR may never see a worse House than the present, which is indifferent honest, as things go.

Lord SALISBURY himself touched not much on domestic politics, and has been duly scolded for not doing so. He has even been scolded from his own side for not having held out some baits to the working classes, in default of which baits it is, it seems, feared that the working classes will go elsewhere, where they can get baits enough in, or rather out of, all conscience. It is scarcely necessary to say from what quarter these scoldings have chiefly come; the student of recent politics knows perfectly well where, when, and why to expect them. We have often said before, and hope often to say again, if necessary, that to do anything of the kind suggested would be to engage in a contest where defeat with disgrace, infinite lack of peace with infinite lack of honour, is certain. If you come to a mere legislation of largesse, Conservatives are certain to be beaten by Radicals; and, if it were possible for them to win, would find neither laurels nor profit waiting for them after the victory. Wise Tories want no new reign of privilege, in which the "rich" are to be subject to taille and corvée, for the sake of the "poor." They do not want to be put into State go-carts, and receive now and then a State plum and cherry and fig if they go nicely. And, if the working classes entertain any of these desires, then we can only say that a heavy responsibility rests on those who encourage them therein, and a bitter removal of delusion awaits themselves when they find that crying for the moon is not getting the moon, and that a man is not much nearer getting the moon because he has been told by this or that demagogue that he shall have it. Fair play in selling your own labour for whatever it will fetch, vigorous protection in holding your own property, small or great, against all who covet it, and provision by the State of those things, and those things only, which a man cannot look to for himself—these three things pretty well sum up the duties of Government to the individual, whether his income be a million a year or sixpence an hour. Lord SALISBURY never showed either more sense or more fortitude than when he confined his remarks on such matters to a warning, especially appropriate from a hard worker and a keen man of business, as to the suicidal tricks which the most newfangled doctrines of the relation of capital and labour are playing. He was less bold, but equally sensible, when he repeated the proposition—old as the hills, but needing to be constantly repeated—that the root and secret of Irish trouble is not a sense that men are refused their rights, but a resolve that men shall, if they can, evade the performance of their duties.

The FOREIGN SECRETARY affected to find some difficulty in discovering matters in his special department to place before his hearers, and yet it is this part of his speech which Europe has recognized as containing good and solid news. Events, according to him, have all been tending in the direction of peace, and this is a very strong statement. Its exact strength may not perhaps at first be fully realized. Lord SALISBURY would probably be the first man to ridicule the doctrine of what may be called the private-information or Zadkiel's-Almanack school of politicians, who hold that there are certain persons—Lord SALISBURY being, of course, one of them—who can tell you that war is going to break out or not going to break out, or the like. He would probably add that such things depend upon certain great forces, the general direction of which can be estimated by any capable and honest man who chooses to turn his attention to them very nearly as well as by the ablest and best-informed of Foreign Secretaries. But what Lord SALISBURY is in a position to know, as not half a dozen other men are, is the general state of opinion in other influential quarters; and when he tells us that this has recently made for peace we have only to believe him and rejoice. His few words on the policy of England in the Mediterranean have commanded general approval. On the three most important points of the moment—Crete, Egypt, and Africa—he managed to say something more definite, but not less important. We are, indeed, inclined to think that he exaggerates the interest that Englishmen take in the slave-trade, or rather we should say that most Englishmen feel that the best way of putting down the slave-trade is to establish English influence firmly in the seats of that trade. It was too early for Lord SALISBURY to take any notice of the answer which Portugal has endeavoured to make to the Charter of the British South African Company; but we trust that not an inch will be yielded to a baseless claim. On Crete the PRIME MINISTER spoke with brevity and truth; we only wish that he had spoken with a little more harshness. That the disturbances in that island are a kind of faction fight is perfectly true. But faction fights wherein one political party in a great foreign country, as well as all the irresponsible and some of the responsible politicians in another small but awkwardly placed State have a distinct interest in egging on one faction to fight, and in shrieking over its bumps and its bruises and the broken glass in its houses when it happens to get beaten, are rather serious things. Still on Crete Lord SALISBURY spoke the truth, if not the whole truth. On Egypt we can welcome (setting aside the eternal omission to remark the one thing left undone which stands against us) the remarks on the PRINCE OF WALES's recent visit, and on the fact that the progress made, great as it is, is nothing like that which would enable us to fulfil the pledge of leaving Egypt to herself when she is able to stand by herself, and not before. To fulfil that pledge, besides many others, two great things have to be done. The reduction of taxation has to be taken in hand, and, in order to the reduction of taxation, that conversion of the debt which France has hitherto steadily opposed. Secondly, the frontier foes who, as Lord SALISBURY justly says (pity he did not go a little into the causes of this!), have twice threatened Egypt during the past year, and have only been driven off by Egyptian troops heavily backed and supported by our own, have to be not only resisted, but prevented. To this latter part of their duty, indeed, HER MAJESTY'S Ministers remain resolutely deaf. They might say, no doubt, that till France permits Egypt to rid herself of the burden of debt, it is expedient to contract the range of her administrative and military liabilities and enterprises as much as possible. They might say that they have been waiting to see what would become of the last remnants of the old dominion. They have preferred to say practically nothing except that reference to the slave-trade, which in this sense may be of good omen. For if the slave-trade is to be stopped anywhere, it must be stopped on the Equator.

THE STRIKES.

THE little piece of advice to master and man which Mr. CHAMBERLAIN put at the end of his discursive remarks to the master bakers of Birmingham was exceedingly wise. He urged them both to consider the market before they quarrelled. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN supplied each side with the name of a respectable virtue which they may apply to their common sense. "But," he said, "there is one rule which I would venture to apply to those circumstances, and that is this—when trade is about to improve let the employers be generous; when trade is declining let the workmen be moderate." The circumstances of which Mr. CHAMBERLAIN spoke were those in which trade is improving or falling off, when masters are called upon to give more, or men are unwilling to take less. Happily the present time is one of improvement, and it is the masters who are called upon to part with their money. Many requests that they will be generous are presented to them on all hands, and in many tones of voice. Many of the well-wishers to their virtue are not so moderate as Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. His steady progress towards a temperate form of Conservative principles has led him to entertain doubts as to the value of a good deal that is preached to the working classes, and even to feel uneasy as to the effects of much social legislation. The ignorance of not a little of this well-meant law-making, and the unforeseen consequences it has on trade, are more obvious to him than they were when he was dealing with the question of marine insurance. This modification of tone in Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S treatment of the sorrows of those who toil and spin does not diminish our generally high opinion of his abilities. We could wish it were imitated by some other advisers of the employers of labour. For Mr. CHAMBERLAIN is plainly of opinion that trade disputes should be settled between the parties to them, without interference from the outside. When that is permitted the settlement is likely to be permanent, because it will be consistent with the facts of the case. There is very little risk that when trade is flourishing the men will be debarred of their share in the improvement. Masters may think that their hands are asking for their share too soon or are asking too much. They may stand out against a rise of wages for a time, but they cannot resist long. It is too manifestly ruinous to allow their business to be stopped when prices are going up and orders are coming in. Neither are the men at all likely to be backward in speaking for themselves. There is at present ample evidence that a revival of prosperity is soon felt by the men in the form of increase of wages. A rise has been granted in many trades, and in one at least it has amounted by successive stages to the very respectable figure of sixty per cent. of their wages. The Scotch coal-miners have enjoyed this remarkable good fortune. It may be—indeed it is—a pity that some employers should compel their men to take the extreme course of saying "If you do not give more money we will give no work," but the fact that it should be so only proves that men are not always wise.

There is, however, a folly which is rather more conspicuous at present than the ill-timed obstinacy of masters. It is the belief of some sentimental persons that wages can be forced up in a declining market, and that masters should be obliged to be "generous" when generosity does not mean admitting their men to a share in increasing profits, but paying them more when business is already somewhat of a loss. The existence of this delusion has been sufficiently well illustrated in London. It is the fact that the Port of London has not shared, and is not likely to share, to any great extent in the general return of prosperty. For various reasons it is not so important a place of trade as it was, and is even likely to decline. There is, in fact, a local depression which is likely to endure. In these circumstances a permanent rise in wages is impossible. They may be forced up for a time, but only at the cost of further damage to the Port by the increase of expenses. Sooner or later—and rather soon than late—the effect of this injury will be felt by the men themselves. This very simple fact has, however, been completely overlooked by the chorus of partly selfish and partly (though in an infinitely smaller degree) sentimental persons who have practically coerced the master lightermen into the surrender of last Saturday. The dispute between them and their men was one in which even Lord BRASSEY now confesses they were largely in the right. The men insisted that one job should be a night's work. To this the masters replied that one job might mean half an hour's work, such as the mere shifting of lighters from one side of a dock or one part of the river to another close at hand. If such jobs were to be counted as a night's work, the expenses of the business will be so increased that the master lightermen might well have to choose between raising their charges or working at a loss. It is notorious that the trade of the Thames cannot stand much, or even any, increase of charges. The alternative, therefore, is that the master lightermen are to lose for the good of the rest of the trading community. Lord BRASSEY seems to have had a glimmering of this when he found it wiser to avoid deciding on the "one job" claim of the men. As soon, however, as it appeared that the men were obstinate, he joined the shipowners and the Committee at the Mansion House in assuring the masters that they must yield—and had, in fact, already conceded the demand of their men in principle. The masters were practically bullied by their fellow-men of business, who could look to nothing but their own immediate convenience, into yielding. As soon as they had done so, the consequences seem to have struck Lord BRASSEY. In his desire to explain that when he said that his award included the "one job" (after previously saying that it did not) he did not mean that every little piece of work was to count as a night's work, he wrote his amazing letter to Mr. WILLIAMS. In the course of this quite exceptional exhibition of confusion of mind, Lord BRASSEY, before lecturing the master lightermen on the proper organization of their business, says in so many words that there are many pieces of work to be done in lighters at night, for which 4s. is excessive payment. He, therefore, is of opinion that they should be thrown together into series, and paid for in the lump as a night's work. But it is precisely this arrangement of small jobs into series against which the men have struck. And it is only a few days since Lord BRASSEY told the masters that they had by implication conceded the demands of the men, which he now acknowledges to be absurd. We have said before, and we say again, that the whole story is an admirable example of allowing business quarrels to be settled by any but business methods. Whatever the motives of Lord BRASSEY and the Committee at the Mansion House may have been—sentiment, popularity-hunting, or mere flightiness—it has forced on a so-called settlement which the arbitrator now sees to be absurd, and which, by the nature of it, cannot last. In the meantime the already heavy difficulties of the trade of London have been increased, and the lightermen have won a temporary victory which must, in the long run, damage themselves. It does not make the prospect more cheerful that the men, whose heads are apparently quite turned by success, have now invented a new string of demands. The fight on the river is not done yet by any means.

The injudicious or interested interference of third parties may possibly aggravate the threatened strike of the bakers. If, however, the dispute is allowed to follow its natural course, there is no reason to suppose that it will be serious. The Strike Committee have disclaimed any intention of "leaving London" (including the strikers, we suppose) "without bread." This moderation of theirs is not, for obvious reasons, deserving of unmixed praise; but it at least shows that they are not beyond the reach of reason. On the other hand, the masters are by no means disposed to be obstinate. As a body, they acknowledge that the desire of the men for shorter hours is reasonable. It is not even their fault if the shorter hours were not made the rule of the trade some years ago. On the occasion of a former strike the masters agreed to recognize twelve hours as a day's work. If this standard was not accepted, then it was because the men were misled into standing out for higher terms than were justified by the state of the trade, and were accordingly beaten in the struggle. At present there is more likelihood that they may succeed completely. It is most probable, however, that no uniform rule will be established. The bakeries which employ large numbers of hands may accept the ten hours day, because it will be possible for them to use reliefs. The smaller bakers will not have the same resource. In their case the day, which is not one of continual work, but of alternate work and waiting, will be of twelve hours. Many masters have made arrangements with their men. When the journeymen bakers insist on standing out for impossible terms they will be beaten. The smaller masters can do whatever skilled work is required in their shops themselves, and whatever unskilled labour they want can be obtained in any quantity. Under these circumstances any attempt on the part of the men to bear down opposition can have but one end. The public need have no difficulty in deciding what its own attitude towards the strike ought to be. In the first place, no terrorism must be allowed; and, in the second, there must be a general disposition to submit with patience to a rise in the price of bread, or to adopt the by no means difficult and very wholesome and economical practice of baking at home. General prosperity and improved wages will make an increase in the cost of the loaf tolerable. If there is any part of the community which thinks that it can secure higher wages for itself and better prices for its produce without promoting a rise all round, it is, we are afraid, destined to disappointment. The hope is a common one; but a universal experience has shown that it is a delusion.

HUMAN BARREL-ORGANS.

WHEN the elderly painter, in M. GUY DE MAUPASSANT'S last novel, has fallen in love with the daughter of the lady to whom he had long been devoted, he ceases to take any pleasure in the society of his kind. He proclaims that the men at his club are so many barrel-organs who can only play a very limited set of conversational tunes. There are moments when most of us agree with the painter, even though we have not attempted his novel and undesirable combination of love affairs. Barrel-organs we all are, and the same forlorn set of jingling tunes we all play. Whatever the topic of conversation may be, we all say the same things about it that we have said a hundred times over. If it is politics, what can any one of us remark that he has not remarked before? Tory or Radical, the cylinder within us has but so many wires and catches, all of them worn, slack, dilapidated. The larger "organs" of opinion are in the same sad state; the handle turns, and the old, old lament goes jolting on. New events do but turn the handle; they are merely fresh texts for the ancient discourse. It is the same story about sport, about literature, even about our friends and enemies, whose private failings remain stereotyped, like the tunes we play upon them. Can any new thing be said about American copyright, about the merits of "Gutties" and "Eclipses," about "Bulgers," about the Club cook, about Psychical Phenomena, about Mr. GLADSTONE, about Impressionism, about Boulangism? "The world is so full of a number of things," as the poet says, that it might seem easy to devise and pour forth fresh conversational melodies. But it is not easy—nay, it is impossible, unless human barrel-organs could be fitted with new cylinders, which is much to be desired. Science may manage this at last. In a novel which is appearing in one of the magazines, somebody finds out a dodge for transferring the nervous force of one person into the body of another. We do not pretend to understand the process, which involves the use of an electric battery and a fiddle-stick. The critical and contemptuous exclamation "Fiddle-stick!" may characterize the whole affair. If it could be managed, if we could decant the nervous energy of strangers into our cronies and companions, into our leading-article writers, into the members of our family, something might be done. It might answer to substitute new cylinders for old in the barrel-organs. But, more probably, the subjects of this experiment would only go on playing the old tunes in new time, quicker or slower. The man with a grievance against publishers would still grind out the Half-profits tune, the Royalty tune, and the other melodies. The celebrated person whose only tune was "Bend Leather" would not spare his audience. The sporting characters would rattle out the familiar notes; the Golfer would not withhold his considerations on Stimie; the Radical would scarce introduce a variation; there would be no change in the Parson, with his airs on Tithes and Working-men's Clubs, and a celebrated essayist would still find flint arrow-heads in cabbage-gardens.

These reflections are not new; they probably occurred to Lord BYRON when he read Count D'ORSAY'S book on England. His lordship observes that he had been at a dinner-party where the twelve most amusing men in London were gathered. Five of them fell asleep! They must have been lulled to sweet forgetfulness by the too familiar tunes of the other seven—by Lord BYRON'S anecdotes of pashas and harems, very likely. Some people wish that they could have dined with souls of poets dead and gone at the "Mermaid Tavern." We make no doubt that after two or three meetings they would have wearied of the tunes which even SHAKSPEARE and BEN JONSON could play. The more sack they drank the more monotonous they would inevitably become. It is as certain as may be that they talked shop; that they discussed the stage of the period; that BEN quoted ARISTOTLE his Poetics and the practice of the ancients; that WILL said the same disrespectful things about these models, that he abused his collaborators and growled at piracies. If ever there was a clever set of barrel-organs, it was the collection of instruments who dined stately with SAINTE-BEUVE and THÉOPHILE GAUTIER, and PAUL DE ST-VICTOR and the Messieurs GONCOURT. Yet the journals of these gentlemen prove that even those organs always ground out the self-same melodies, the outworn paradoxes, the bosh about the bourgeoisie. More melancholy conviviality there might not be after a time than the talk about literature and art of the men who were best fitted to talk about them. It is only Dr. JOHNSON who never, or hardly ever, strummed to the dreary old cadence; only about him was one thing certain, that no mortal could tell what tune he would play next. The conversation of SOCRATES was much less varied than that to which the Doctor contributed when he could say, "Sir, we had good talk." When we read the enthusiastic accounts that visitors give of SCOTT'S talk at Abbotsford, can we help feeling a little for Lady SCOTT and the girls? All these many tunes were familiar to them, and there was not one new to their ears among the anecdotes that were so good, and seemed to strangers so inexhaustible.

The remedy for all this might seem to lie in the constant discovery of new companions in new conditions and ways of life. This desire it is, not mere love of gain, that drives Mr. THOMSON up among the Masai, and that discovered the American continent. CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS, no doubt, was tired of Genoese gossip, and of affairs in Spain. CORTES was anxious to shift the scene, to change the cylinders, and there can be no doubt that, for some days, there must have been a freshness in the table-talk of MONTEZUMA. We cannot all be wanderers like these impetuous men, and it is certain that we gain little by meeting people at dinner whom we never met before. For even if they have some new tunes, and do not repeat commonplaces about Dr. IBSEN, about Mr. BARNUM, about the Decline and Fall of the British Empire, we ourselves have only our old tunes to play. Nobody can be so tired of them as we are ourselves. They may, by miracle, be new to the listener, but the performer lacks the complacency of the wandering Italian minstrel. He nods his head with pleasure at his jingling old strains, but the human barrel-organ, with a conscience, would give the world for new cylinders. No doubt this weariness of speaking and listening was the cause that peopled the Thebaid with anchorites, and drove millions of hermits into the forests of India. It was only the sanguine and frivolous Athenians who persuaded themselves that they could either hear or tell "some new thing." The thing might be new, but alas for the comments!

THE CITY OF FEARS.

ANOTHER of the numerous meetings in which the German EMPEROR has figured lately took place at Innsbruck on Thursday; and the City of Fears, as Vienna has not unappropriately been called, was somewhat disturbed at the fact. It might have been thought that the frequency of the shock would diminish its intensity. WILLIAM II. has a young man's passion for wandering about the world and despatching to Prince BISMARCK or the EMPRESS telegrams in the style of Mr. RUSKIN. This is quite German :—

Die Herren, die waren ästhetisch, Die Damen von zarten Gefühl,

as HEINE appropriately remarks, though the particular Herr in question—the CHANCELLOR—troubles himself not much about sunsets. In the intervals of sunset-seeing politics are, no doubt, occasionally talked. The worst of it seems to be that the passion for international visits seems to be spreading with disastrous consequences to the poorer, and therefore the more generous, States. It is edifying to the more sarcastic students of politics to see Western monarchs paying visits to the SULTAN. The SULTAN does not understand the cheap hospitalities of modern Christendom, with their gifts of photographs and honorary commissions. A considerable hole must have been made in the already tattered budget of Turkey by the German visit, and a larger still will be made by that coup de théâtre, the CZAR's visit, now talked of. But it is, no doubt, justifiable to "cosher" on the infidel. Elsewhere visits may admittedly be made with less compunction, as well as with more ease and comfort.

The Viennese alarm, moreover, is connected with quite different considerations. Austrian politicians fear that, as a result of recent reconciliations between Germany and Russia, efforts may be made to induce the Austro-Hungarian Government to favour, or at least to abstain from thwarting, Russian designs on Bulgaria. It may be admitted that men have been alarmed by more fantastic fears. Independently of mere gossip, it seems extremely probable that, for the moment, a somewhat warmer understanding between the two EMPERORS of Northern Europe has been established, and it is unluckily known that Bulgaria is the CZAR's pet madness. It has been more than suspected that the reason which Russia has had for stirring up trouble in Servia has been far less any desire to act in that country than a wish to have a quid (if only a quid of abstention) pro quo to offer to Austria in regard to the more easterly State. And, lastly, there are strong reasons for believing that Prince BISMARCK's frequent and ostentatious disclaimers of any interest in the Eastern question are not mere pretence but represent a real undervaluation. The very ablest statesmen are prone to such undervaluation—and too often, in the words of the epigram due to CLARENDON and worthy of TACITUS, "fall by those things they most despised." Let us hope that neither Prince BISMARCK nor his country will so fall. But, if the interest of Germany in the settlement of the Eastern question seems to the blind eye of even this sharp-sighted politician negligible, it is difficult to imagine how the interest of Austria in it can ever seem so to any Austrian sovereign or statesman who has eyes in his head at all. It is a complete delusion to imagine that, as not only Russophiles with intent to deceive, but even others, sometimes pretend, the end of the matter must, at the best, be a division of the Balkan Peninsula between the two Powers, and therefore Austria might as well make that division à l'amiable. The fact is that Austro-Hungary cannot suffer Russia to round the corner, to get across the Danube, to command that river's mouth and the entrance to the Euxine, without certain danger, and probable ruin; without, in fact, hastening the dissolution of the Empire, part being absorbed by Germany, and the rest by Russia and Italy. And it is also known that the distrust of Prince BISMARCK which lurks in Austrian minds is due less to old grudges than to a suspicion that he might not be indisposed to play for this. The suspicion is possibly unjust; for the CHANCELLOR is not much of a day-after-to-morrow politician. But it exists, it concerns a real danger, and it ought to make Austrians extremely shy of doing anything that may bring that danger nearer.

PUFF! PUFF!

IN the matter of Mr. BARNUM it is the English aristocracy and the English newspaper that have led the way in proclaiming their emancipation from the hidebound prejudices of their island home. The words "the English newspaper," of course, refer to the Times. Once more, with the intrepid daring and scorn of prejudice which enshrined in a martyr's halo the memory of an early proprietor of that mighty periodical, the Times marches the foremost pioneer in the vanguard of progress. The aristocracy marched boldly too; but in these Radical days the fact would have been of but little use but for the encouragement and the testimony of the Times. Full-blown earls, sons of dukes and marquesses, real editors, and, it is believed, live theatrical managers, crowded to the banquet "to meet Mr. BARNUM" at the Hôtel Métropole. Lord ROSEBURY, Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, and Lord CHARLES BERESFORD, who are said to have figured on the "Committee of Organization," wrote deploring their inability to be present. Mr. GLADSTONE (of course) sent a holograph communication expressing his sympathetic admiration for the character, talents, and career of Mr. BARNUM. It seems that a person of rank came and took the chair, and suitable speeches were made, until Mr. BARNUM, in the course of returning thanks for the toast of his health, diverged into an anecdote so exquisitely entertaining that the company forgot their manners, and compelled him to go on telling anecdotes apparently until it was time to go home. And a few days after the banquet both banquet and hero were bravely and openly blessed by the Times. The effete Briton was contrasted in a properly humble spirit with the all-conquering American. In England, we were told, "there is a deficiency of elasticity under the pressure of misfortunes. Among American citizens that is a quality which overflows, and in nobody has it been more conspicuous than in PHINEAS T. BARNUM." If Mr. GLADSTONE himself had gone to the banquet, he could not have put it better. And what follows is worthy of him, too. "He [Mr. BARNUM] has been ridiculed, and his name has been turned into a synonym for charlatanism and imposture. Floods of disaster have been unable to sweep away his faith in his own necessity to three generations; and contemporary opinion [hitherto expressed in this benighted country by the leaders of opinion only] has justified him in the end." Mr. BARNUM "is the Great Showman." He is compared favourably with "PHARAOHS and NEBUCHADNEZZARS," with ALEXANDER, CÆSAR, and NAPOLEON I. He "doubtless might have been an Egyptian, Assyrian, Macedonian, Roman, or Gallic conqueror if he had chosen to set his mind to it." Then follows a faint attempt to indicate the more salient glories of the unparalleled Show, the "skeleton dude," the man with his feet in his stomach, and all the rest of it. For particulars see bills of every size distributed on the ordinary terms.

All this is ludicrous enough; but, speaking seriously, it is worth while to consider what Mr. BARNUM is that he should have got such a list of stewards to his dinner, and have made such an impression on the editor of an extremely respectable newspaper. He is the proprietor of a travelling Show. His Show may be the biggest in the world; there are a great many shows, and somebody's must be the biggest. But in just one thing Mr. BARNUM probably is, as he claims to be, unrivalled. That is, in the pertinacity and the audacity with which he advertises his wares. Advertisement has been defined as lying. That is rude to advertisers; but for all that there is some truth in it. If you advertise a new shirt-collar, you assert as a fact that it is far more becoming and convenient than any other kind. Whether it is so or not is really a matter of opinion, and it is safe to say that there is never such a marked and generally admitted superiority as the advertiser asserts. Therefore the advertiser says what is not true. It is not the same thing as lying, because nobody who thinks about it believes the advertiser's statements, and the advertiser does not expect that any one will. Still, there is no getting out of the fact that all puffing advertisements are statements of the thing that is not, and are intended to produce some effect. What is peculiar about Mr. BARNUM is that he can puff himself "so loud and so much, and moreover in Dutch," that he can induce the editor of the Times to print, in the form of a leading article, a puff of BARNUM's Show as extravagant and ridiculous as any posted on the hoardings by Mr. BARNUM himself. Now, this is a thing that in this country money will not do. It can only be accomplished by great adaptability and knowledge of men and of the world. Mr. BARNUM is an astute and able showman, and, as this is all in the way of his business, it is very much to his credit. No blame attaches to Mr. BARNUM for his very natural conduct in puffing his Show as hard as he could. But whether the various persons who allowed themselves to be made the instruments of the puffing, and got nothing for it, are to be congratulated on the figure they cut is quite another question.

MR. BALFOUR AT IPSWICH.

IF there be one man in England who should hear with satisfaction that Mr. GLADSTONE has begun to suspect that his "utterances have been multiplied of late beyond what is desirable," that man surely should be Mr. BALFOUR. For many a month past the amount of Mr. GLADSTONE's utterances has formed the measure of Mr. BALFOUR's controversial activity. The Leader of the Opposition never speaks without misrepresenting the CHIEF SECRETARY and his policy, and the CHIEF SECRETARY never allows himself and his policy to be misrepresented by the Leader of the Opposition without promptly exposing his traducer. Nor does he seem to care whether the calumny is a new or an old one; though we cannot doubt that a Minister so imperturbable under attack would prefer novelty, even in slander, and is much less likely to dread an assailant's power of wounding than his ability to bore. Anyhow, Mr. BALFOUR almost invariably answers when Mr. GLADSTONE attacks, and as Mr. GLADSTONE brings forth new things and old, with a decided preponderance of the latter, it follows that Mr. BALFOUR is obliged to go over a good deal of familiar ground in the course of a year. Thus it is that we find him at this time of day replying with his usual humorous patience to that "unparalleled novelty" in indictments—the charge that the Crimes Act is employed in Ireland to put down lawful combinations, and that the Irish Executive are engaged in an oppressive attempt to put down Trades-Unionism in Ireland. It is curious to note the strength of Mr. GLADSTONE's belief—not, of course, an entirely unfounded one in such a political society as ours—that by misnaming a combination to defraud, associated with a conspiracy to maim and murder, he will succeed in persuading the masses that fraud, murder, and mutilation ought not to be interfered with by law. It is still more singular that he should fancy this feasible, when, as a matter of fact, it cannot be entirely forgotten by the masses aforesaid that crime on this side of St. George's Channel has before this taken shelter under the eminently respectable name of Trades-Unionism. The name of a certain Mr. BROADHEAD who endeavoured to convert certain of his fellow-workmen to "the cause" by the expedient of blowing up their houses with gunpowder cannot have been absolutely forgotten. And the mere fact that the "lawful combinations" in Ireland against which the Crimes Act is directed only proceed to violence through an intermediate stage of boycotting is immaterial.

Mr. BALFOUR, as is natural to a thinker of philosophic habit, has been much interested in Mr. GLADSTONE's definition of the Plan of Campaign as "extra-legal," and has diligently endeavoured to discover any neutral or intermediate state of acts—any limbus facinorum, so to speak—in which conduct that lies outside the bounds of legality may find a place of abode not itself included within the infinite area of the unlawful. We need hardly say that even Mr. BALFOUR's industry and acuteness have been disappointed, and that his fruitless search has only proved what might have been safely guessed without it, that Mr. GLADSTONE has been simply dealing, after a more than usually audacious fashion, in false analogies. Probably he hopes to find plenty of understandings confused enough to suppose that because the words "religious" and "irreligious," and even the words "moral" and "immoral," do not cover the whole field of human action—because there are some acts which are merely non-religious, and others which morality neither enjoins nor forbids, there must also be some which stand in the same relation to law. Of course there are no acts of the kind. Law is a system of prohibitions, and every human act in the world must be forbidden by it or permitted. If it is permitted, and whatever is not forbidden by law is permitted by it, it is legal; if it is forbidden, it is not extra-legal, but illegal. The Plan of Campaign has been pronounced by judges of the High Court in Ireland to be a combination which the law, if appealed to, would forbid; and so-called extra-legality is therefore, as Mr. BALFOUR well says, only a polite description applied to it by a critic who dares not take the responsibility of justifying it, but does not wish to be too severe in its condemnation. Mr. BALFOUR, moreover, very wisely declined to neglect that function of the Crimes Act which Mr. GLADSTONE habitually ignores—its operation, namely, in restraint, not of criminal combination, but of actual murder and outrage; and, in illustration of this, he cited a case, the significance of which must be apparent to every one who has paid any attention to the course of events in Ireland. The Government, in fact, might well be content to rest the defence of their legislation on a review of the improvement which has taken place in the condition of the single county of Kerry. This county was, indeed, as Mr. BALFOUR reminds us, the despair of the Irish Executive under Mr. GLADSTONE's Administration. What has happened there since the passing of the Crimes Act is that the perpetrators of no fewer than four murders and six murderous outrages—criminals who, without the assistance of that Act, would undoubtedly have escaped punishment—have been brought to justice.

Perhaps, however, the most effective part of the CHIEF SECRETARY's speech was that in which he dealt with Mr. GLADSTONE's attempt to explain away the general improvement which even he is obliged to recognize as having taken place in the general condition of Ireland since the Act was passed. It is amusing by the way to observe, as Mr. BALFOUR did in passing, that, when the measure was under consideration, it was Mr. GLADSTONE's cue to make out that crime had decreased in Ireland, and that he accordingly subtracted 120 from the list of offences; whereas, now that it is to the interest of his argument to make out that crime has not diminished, an addition of 110 takes the place of the subtraction of 120. In so far, however, as he admits the occurrence of any improvement he proposes to account for it by three causes independent of the legislation for the reinforcement of the law. He attributes it, first, to the teaching of the Irish priests; secondly, to the influence of the Irish members; and, thirdly, to the effect of the remedial measures with the passing of which he himself has been concerned. With the two former of these audacious propositions Mr. BALFOUR did not deem it necessary to deal at any length. When an Irish Archbishop has openly declared his approval of acts of forcible resistance to the execution of legal process, and when an Irish priest has just pleaded guilty in a court of justice to a breach of the law which led directly to a brutal and cowardly murder, and ultimately resulted in the condemnation of many of his flock to long terms of penal servitude, it is certainly not unreasonable that the burden of proof, with respect to Mr. GLADSTONE's first explanation, rests upon Mr. GLADSTONE himself. As regards the influence of the Irish members, that is a point upon which the Special Commission will soon probably have something to say; and in the meantime Mr. GLADSTONE's declaration that crime dogged the steps of the Association which is inseparably connected with the Nationalist party in the House of Commons "still holds the field" as the last authoritative deliverance on the subject. But it is Mr. BALFOUR's treatment of the third of these Gladstonian causæ causantes which is the most delightfully destructive. For it turns out, upon a reference to statistics, that, so far from remedial legislation having improved the condition of Ireland, it has, for the last twenty years, been followed, in every single instance, by an increase of agrarian crime, which, on the subsequent passing of repressive legislation, has as regularly declined. In 1866, before Mr. GLADSTONE had become Prime Minister, or had thought of any of his remedial measures, the returns of agrarian crime touched their lowest point—in the number 87. From that year it went on rising until the disestablishment of the Irish Church, when it immediately leaped up from 767 to 1,329. Mr. GLADSTONE then promptly passed a Crimes Act; whereupon crime straightway fell to 373, and went on falling until it reached 136 in 1875, when the Conservatives were in office, and deemed themselves justified in relaxing the stringency of the Act of 1870. Upon this the tide again turned, and crime continued slowly rising till 1878, when it touched 301. It was shortly after this that Mr. PARNELL "took his coat off," and the returns advanced in 1879 from 301 to 863. In the following year Mr. GLADSTONE came into office, and this number, instantly trebling itself, rose to 2,585. In 1881 it touched the enormous total of 4,439, and Mr. GLADSTONE brought in and passed a Coercion Act. Under the effect of this it sunk, in 1882, to 3,433; and the second, and more stringent, measure of repression, enacted in 1883, produced the much more substantial reduction of it to 870. It was 762 in 1884, which was the last unbroken year of Mr. GLADSTONE's Administration. Surely after this disastrous exposure of its utter fallacy we ought to hear no more of the argument that agrarian crime in Ireland varies directly with the amount of legislative bribery employed upon the country, and not with the amount of Executive vigour brought to bear, by means of legislation, upon the detection and punishment of the criminals. But, of course, we have not heard the last of the argument, or nearly so. Mr. GLADSTONE will doubtless reproduce it, whenever occasion offers, with as unblushing an effrontery as if it had resisted all attacks, instead of having been literally laid in ruins.

KENSINGTON GARDENS.

ONCE again has the autumnal tree-felling in Kensington Gardens been greeted with certain clamorous objections. Work most needful, though belated, has been stigmatized as wanton and ignorant, as if any Governmental department ever laboured without knowledge or incitement. There has been a wailing heard of "noble elms" ruthlessly brought low, not from ejected Dryads, but from the chance wayfarer and the well-meaning enthusiast. There have been wild outcries about ugly iron railings, and complaints more vague yet equally inconsiderate. In all this lamentation there is much of the grand old ADAM of inveterate grumbling against all who are set in authority over us, and still more of unreasoning clamour. The noble elms that are said to have fallen are quite imaginary objects. The majority of the trees felled are spindly limes and horse-chestnuts. These have been judiciously thinned from a mass of timber that should never have been permitted to present the pitiful spectacle of a struggle for fit survival. The fell deed ought to have been done thirty years ago. As it is, good only results. No one can say with COWPER, grieving over the fall of his colonnade of poplars, "Farewell to the shade," for the shade remains, though the grove is less obscure and more shapely. The gain of fuller light and freer air to the remaining trees is immeasurable. In no instance has a single fine specimen been removed. The strongest criticism called for in the circumstances is, that it is somewhat late in the day to do work that ought never to have been so obviously necessary. If it had not been for the scandalous neglect of the past, we should have heard nothing of the voice of the newspaper Correspondent. The wiseacres who complain of the iron hurdles in the Broad Walk and elsewhere might, perhaps, explain how the new-sown grass is to prosper if the soil is to be left open to the many-footed crowd. It were far more seasonable to protest against the inefficient protection of the Gardens and the public, and the freedom at present allowed to roughs and sturdy beggars. The absence of police, or the entirely inadequate force of keepers, supplies a genuine grievance, not a fictitious ground for sentimental outcry.

Considering the recent grumbling of ill-informed persons, it is only bare justice to the authorities to enumerate the many improvements effected in Kensington Gardens since we discussed the subject of tree-felling. As was then advocated, the swampy triangular space near Palace Gate has been drained. The trees planted have been well grouped and at proper intervals. They are no longer enclosed by the old-fashioned, rounded iron hurdles, but are staked properly, and mischievous boys cannot climb and sway their jubilant bodies on the tender lower limbs. And this suggests the necessity of immediate attention to the injury done to the low hanging boughs of the trees by idle people. The trees should be carefully overlooked and trimmed so as to be out of reach. There being no deer in Kensington Gardens, it is impossible to preserve what the old school of landscape-gardeners call a "browsing line." Sheep do their level best; but it is a low level, and ineffectual. Thus it is left to the horseplay of 'ARRY and his like, with ruinous results to many a picturesque tree. There is no occasion to lop the lower limbs, which, as Mr. MICHIE points out, in his excellent treatise on Forestry, is extremely pernicious. Then, further to appease the grumblers, we may cite the general supervision of the Gardens. The paths are better kept than ever they have been since the enclosure was open to the public, and the new paths and entrances are universally admitted to be both useful and requisite. The long flower-walk from Palace Gate, past the Albert Memorial, to the road over the Serpentine is greatly improved under the present wise and careful system of gardening. Any one who saw this summer the superb show of Delphiniums and other herbaceous perennials, or the fine display of Lilium auratum, to name a few results of good culture triumphing over a naturally poor soil and smoky air, knows that much praise is due to the authorities.

These borders are not now left, as once they were, starved of all nutriment. Here were to be seen this summer floral effects as natural and charming as any in the best gardens, such as might rejoice the soul of Mr. WILLIAM ROBINSON and other advocates of a return to nature in such matters. Perhaps the labels are a little overdone, both as to supply and style. No one wants Kensington Gardens transformed to a little Kew. If only the less common trees and shrubs are labelled, it is all that is wanted. A huge notification of such common objects as Aucuba japonica, repeated half a dozen times in a few yards, is a concession superfluous to the Cockney. These flower-walks and shrubberies, though delightful appendages to the Gardens, are, of course, of secondary interest to the broad acres of woodland. To any real or threatened peril involving the characteristic wildness and beauty of these we should be vigorous opponents. But there is no ground for apprehension at present, and the woodman's axe must by now have completed the necessary work. An open space girt about by miles of brick and mortar that could boast this summer of a pair of kestrels, not to mention other wild birds, cannot have lost much of its ancient charm of peace and verdure.

PHILOSOPHY IN DIFFICULTIES.

BEFORE Mr. MORLEY concluded his interview with the Labour-party deputation at Newcastle last week, he did not fail to declare his surprise and annoyance at the heckling to which he had been subjected. It was, as he said, most untimely; and his vexation was all the more natural if he had reason to suspect a design on the part of the New or Laboucherian Radicals to wring him free of his principles or out of the party. But Mr. MORLEY is something more than a party politician, unless he is much misunderstood. He thinks of other things beside place; and he must have been gratified to find, a few days after he was released from the Labour-party inquisition, that his tormentors had fixed attention upon a very mischievous practice, which therefore is likely to be repeated less often in time to come.

The circumstances must be explained a little. It seems that the members of the Labour Deputation that waited on Mr. MORLEY were each entrusted with a separate department of investigation. To one man was assigned the duty of looking into Mr. MORLEY's opinions on education, another was to put him on the rack of Home Rule, and so forth. The business of catechizing the right honourable gentleman on the subject of land nationalization fell to a Mr. LAIDLER, whose reading had specially qualified him for the task. When his turn came, this inquisitor asked Mr. MORLEY whether he was for nationalizing of the land. Seeing that it behoved him to be wary, the member for Newcastle replied by asking whether the Labour party represented by Mr. LAIDLER had any distinct conceptions and plans of their own. Then followed a little conversation to this effect. Mr. LAIDLER intimated that he and his friends knew perfectly well what they wanted, and why they wanted it; and at once proceeded to put the whole Labour programme in a nutshell. "They remembered that Mr. HERBERT SPENCER had said that the land had been taken "by force and fraud; and that gentleman had also said "that to right one wrong it takes another." "Why! has he "said this?" Mr. MORLEY asked. "We all know he has," was the reply. "But you are aware that he has recalled "some of the things he has laid down?" "Yes," was the pregnant answer; "but if he has stated truth and recalled "it, the truth will prevail."

The significance of this brief conversation is remarkable in every word; as has already been pointed out by Mr. FREDERICK GREENWOOD in a letter to the Times. Mr. LAIDLER evidently belongs to the better class of artisans; men who read, and think, and know the value of authority. If such men are misled by their teachers, it may be a matter of grave concern for us all. For they, in turn, teach others who are incapable of tackling books like Mr. SPENCER's for themselves; and they are all "on the alert for "warranted theories of social reform that will better their "condition." Now take this case of Mr. LAIDLER and the Newcastle Labour party, which must be assumed to be the case of thousands of other working-men in their several organizations. They pick up a book of Social Statics, written by a great thinker and independent writer. They find in it certain discourse on the private ownership of land, and learn that it is like no other property but "the ownership of man by man"; that, like the first of a family of slaves, it was originally acquired as private property by force or fraud. They also fish up from Mr. SPENCER's writings an assertion that to right one wrong it is sometimes necessary to do another. Put these doctrines together, and what do they come to? Nothing less than this: If the people have a mind to take back what was originally stolen from the community by force or fraud, they may do so without troubling themselves much about exact terms of compensation. But now Mr. SPENCER speaks. He says that, as he cannot remember everything that he has written during the last forty years, it would be unsafe to assert positively that he has nowhere said that "to right one wrong it is sometimes necessary to do another." But, he adds, he certainly has not said it in connexion with the question of landownership. If, however, he has said it at all, that is obviously enough for Mr. LAIDLER. It is a dogma of general application; and, if true, the Labour party may fairly claim to apply it to the resumption of land stolen from the people. But Mr. SPENCER says more than this. He pleads that, though he still adheres to the general principles laid down in Social Statics, he "dissents from some of the deductions" and has revised his conclusions. Which of them? He himself tells us that the only respect in which his earlier views are changed is that, whereas in 1850 he supposed that "the resumption of landownership by the community" would be economically advantageous, he has now come to a directly opposite opinion. He still compares the acquisition of private property in land to the "ownership of man by man," still leaves Mr. LAIDLER to believe that they were equally obtained by force and fraud; and that is not quite all either. Though Mr. SPENCER declares that, while he cannot be positive, he does not believe he ever said that to right one wrong it is sometimes necessary to do another, he does not repudiate that doctrine now. True, he is sure that he never uttered it in connexion with landownership; but that is nothing to the purpose, as we have already pointed out. Mr. LAIDLER has a perfect right to apply it so, on Mr. SPENCER's authority, if it be a general doctrine of that gentleman's, or until he shows why landownership is exempt from it while other wrongs are not. This is a point that must be borne in mind when we come to some further statements of Mr. SPENCER's, and especially to his closing letter in the Times of Friday. Meantime, let us put the supposition that this great writer has changed his views on the subject altogether. Let us suppose him now declaring that, while he no longer thinks it safe to say that private ownership of land rests on force and fraud, he is sure that no wrong should ever be righted by the perpetration of another. Could we hope with any confidence that the Labour party would thereupon give up their views too? Not if we may judge from the language and the obvious thought of its spokesman at Newcastle. His most significant word was uttered when he said—his attention having been called to the fact that some of Mr. SPENCER's earlier views had been changed—"Yes, but if he has stated truth and has recalled it, the truth will prevail." What Mr. LAIDLER meant by this is manifest. Hearing what he had heard from Mr. SPENCER's lips, he knew it at once for truth and righteousness. Mr. SPENCER may talk of recalling it, but that cannot be done. The word of truth, once spoken, is irrevocable and indestructible; it must live, and it "will prevail." That is what Mr. LAIDLER means, and he is easily intelligible.

To do any good, then, all that lies with Mr. SPENCER now is to discover that he never said that to right one wrong it is sometimes necessary to do another. If he cannot do that, what is the use of his telling the democracy that they must compensate existing landowners for what belongs to them in the land, and compensate them fully, if they take the land back? What is the use, we mean, so far as his own great authority goes? And if he adds, as in fact he does now, that when just compensation is paid they will have a disastrously bad bargain, what again is the use of that? The answer will be, "Yes; but is it not sometimes necessary to do one wrong in order to remedy another? Why should not we venture a little wrong in this case and compensate by half? Or suppose we give notice that private ownership is to terminate thirty years hence?" Of course, if Mr. SPENCER was writing only for philosophers like himself, and none but the philosophical read him and went by his authority, he need not trouble much to make such explanations and corrections. But evidently that is not the case; and it certainly does seem that he must regret the publication of ill-considered social reform theories, unaccompanied, as one of the letter-writers on the subject has it, by a clear recital of whatever reasons may be fatal to their application in this work-a-day world. Indeed, his regret is avowed in the excusatory statement, recently made, that what he said on this subject "was said in the belief that the questions raised were not likely to come to the front in our time or for many generations." Elsewhere he goes so far as to admit by clear implication that not till humanity has become quite different from what it is now can the land be resumed on just conditions without absolute disaster. But should he not have made that opinion clear from the beginning of his teaching? Is it not a pity that it should not come in till nearly the end of it, and after his unguarded reflections have misled so many ignorant poor men, besides supplying plausible weapons for demagogues? Surely it is a great matter for regret, though Mr. SPENCER is not the only teacher of things social and political who should be conscious of the feeling. Of course he is right in searching out "a system of absolute political ethics, or that which ought to be," which is all that was intended in the writing of Social Statics. Only to view afar off an unattainable standard of perfect morality is a good and profitable thing, and no one has yet said, or is likely to say, a slighting word against the man who helps the world in that high way. All the same, however, extraordinary mischief is often done by seclusion-of-the-closet politicians, by social philosophers adrift from human nature as it is; and it is a reasonable prayer to ask them to mend their ways.

THE GOATFELL MURDER.

OF course there is a "movement" in progress for the reprieve of LAURIE, who murdered Mr. ROSE upon Goatfell, in the Isle of Arran. Murder seldom excites much popular sympathy with the victim, who in this case was a harmless, amiable young fellow enjoying his brief annual holiday. But a murderer always has friends, especially when, as in this case, he has committed a particularly cold-blooded crime for an unusually inadequate motive. Mr. ROSE can be accused of nothing worse than a want of discrimination in his choice of companions, or rather, perhaps, an inability to get rid of pertinacious, albeit undesirable, associates. LAURIE forced himself upon Mr. ROSE's acquaintance, followed him about wherever he went, and, finally, killed him for the sake of his money. It seems to a great many people in Scotland perfectly intolerable that a merciless reprobate of this description should be prevented from doing further mischief. So they are getting up a petition that his precious life may be spared to society and to his admirers. Unfortunately, LAURIE was convicted by a majority only of the fifteen jurymen who tried him; and this fact is construed to imply an element of uncertainty in the case. Rumour, which appears to be quite unauthoritative, puts the number of jurors who were against conviction at seven, and the majority therefore at one. As the foreman very properly declined to give any information, this must be mere conjecture. It is, moreover, extremely improbable, inasmuch as the evidence of guilt was clear and strong. The Scotch practice of majority verdicts, though in accordance with the fashionable principle of counting heads, may be very easily attacked, and not so easily defended. But, if it is to be maintained—and in everything except party politics the Scotch are intensely conservative—there seems to be no necessity for making any statement on the subject in open Court. The same legal consequences follow conviction whether the jury be unanimous or not. If, on the other hand, a minority can, by holding out, save a prisoner from the gallows, a minority there will almost always be. In England their obstinacy would render the whole trial abortive, and that is a serious responsibility to undertake. In Scotland they do not prevent a verdict of "Guilty" from being returned. There will be one or two men on every jury who either disapprove of capital punishment altogether or shrink from inflicting it upon an actual individual whom they have seen. If LAURIE were reprieved, this class of persons could prevent the execution of any murderer in Scotland without letting assassins immediately loose upon society.

The only conceivable plea in mitigation of LAURIE's wickedness is the plea of insanity. He did behave oddly after the crime, though he was sane enough before it. But that defence might have been set up at the trial, and the fact that it was not speaks volumes. LAURIE was represented by the Dean of Faculty, Mr. J. B. BALFOUR, one of the most eminent of Scotch lawyers. The Dean's contention was that, though LAURIE might have robbed Mr. ROSE, he did not murder him. LAURIE was the last person seen in the company of the poor young tourist. He disappeared immediately after the disappearance of Mr. ROSE, he evaded the notice of the police for several weeks, and, when he was caught, he tried to commit suicide. The medical witnesses called for the prisoner expressed the opinion that Mr. ROSE had fallen into the crevice where his body was found, and that his death was caused by the fall. Unfortunately for this otherwise wholly plausible theory, stones were piled upon Mr. ROSE's body, and his hat, which was found in the bed of a neighbouring stream, had stones inside it. "The pig," said the judge, on a famous occasion—"the pig may, indeed, in a moment of uncontrollable emotion, have flung itself upon the spiked railing, and so died. But it can hardly have afterwards skinned itself, and hung itself in the prisoner's back garden." LAURIE actually came back to his lodgings with a felt hat belonging to Mr. ROSE on his head. The Lord Justice CLARK, in grave and decorous language, applied the analogy of the pig's case to the state of Mr. ROSE's body and the conduct of Mr. ROSE's murderer. There was no such conflict of medical testimony, real or apparent, as saved the life of Mrs. MAYBRICK. The wounds seen on the corpse were admittedly fatal, and the question how they had been caused was one of ordinary common sense. Except that the victim was an Englishman, while the prisoner is a Scotchman, we can suggest no reason why LAURIE should not be hanged. And it must be remembered that Mr. ROSE was warned by a Scotchman against making the ascent of Goatfell in the company of such a suspicious-looking stranger.

FRANCE.

IT is possibly natural that foreign observers should over-rate both the present importance of General BOULANGER and the significance of his undoubted failure in the late elections. Certainly, whether the error is excusable or not, it is made. Much is said about his Manifesto, and the abortive demonstration which he and his partisans may or may not have endeavoured to organize for the day of the opening of the Chambers, and it is said to the exclusion of things which are of more moment for the time being. Even as curiosities, the General's movements and his proclamations are hardly worth looking at. They are mere repetitions of what we have so often seen before. A few months ago his mysterious appearances and disappearances, his sweeping abuse and vague promises, were of real importance, since he had undoubtedly persuaded several constituencies to elect him, and it was at least possible that he might find support in all parts of France. He has not done so, and, therefore, although he is by no means extinguished, he has ceased to be, for some time at least, a possible ruler of France. The Ministry of M. TIRARD was prepared for a demonstration in Paris on the opening day of the new Session, and took their precautions. Their measures may be commended to the attention of those Englishmen who thought the liberty of the subject menaced by the suppression of mob meetings in Trafalgar Square. Paris was filled with troops and police, who lined every approach to the Chamber, and who ran in everybody who as much as looked as if he would like to hear somebody say "Vive BOULANGER!" Accordingly "Vive BOULANGER!" was very little said. Hardly a hundred of his followers put in an appearance, nor was the slightest emotion displayed when M. DÉROULÈDE and several colleagues were marched to the guardhouse. For the present, then, there is no prospect of disorder in Paris, and as another general election is a long way off, the Republican Government may consider that it is in no further immediate danger from the Boulangists. This would seem to be recognized by the chiefs of that party themselves. They have at last acknowledged their defeat in the departments, and show some intention to devote themselves to Paris. There they have still a game to play. Unless their popularity diminishes very rapidly they can secure a majority of seats in the Municipal Council, and then they will possess a stronghold from which they can worry the Government with some effect. The resolution shown by their supporters in Paris hitherto, which is not likely to be weakened by rivalry with the rural constituencies, promises very well for this plan. The Boulangists will be wise to keep to it. As long as they remain an organized body in Paris, they can at least wait to profit by any mistakes the Chambers may commit.

The first act of the Chamber of Deputies has decidedly a hopeful look for them. It is undeniable that the election of M. FLOQUET as provisional President of the Chamber is a sign of the undiminished influence of the Radical over the Opportunist Deputies. That the result of the elections was to be taken as a proof of the disgust felt in all parts of France with the consequences of Radical dictation has been a commonplace. Certainly the Radicals themselves have lost seats, which may be taken to prove that they have lost power. It had been hoped that the Opportunist Deputies would see the unwisdom of submitting to their Radical allies. The Moderate Republicans had hoped that their own leader, M. LÉON SAY, might be selected as candidate. If he had been, he would probably have secured the support of at least a considerable section of the Conservatives. There is a strong inclination at present among the Royalists to give a provisional support to any Republican Administration which would promise to take in hand the very pressing task of restoring the finances to order, and would undertake to stop the laicization of the schools, and to cease from insulting whatever remains of religious feeling there may be among Frenchmen. The selection of M. LÉON SAY as provisional President would have been a guarantee of moderation on the part of the Republican majority, and would have prepared the way for that coalition of sensible men which is to put a stop, as some very hopeful Frenchmen believe, to the "sterile agitation of dynastic parties." Unfortunately the Opportunists would have nothing to do with M. LÉON SAY, who is so reactionary as to think that parents should be allowed to have their children taught by religious teachers if they please. They took M. FLOQUET instead, who is a Radical of the Radicals and an anti-Clerical. Such a choice is a fair warning to the Conservatives that the new Chamber will follow in the footsteps of the old. It is true that the choice is excused by many general declarations of an intention to follow a moderate policy on the part both of Opportunists and Radicals. The Conservatives may, however, very justly ask for better security than is afforded by the promises of one party which has never shown any will of its own, and of another which has never failed to show the most fanatical rancour. The choice is a defeat for the Moderate Republicans no less than for the Conservatives. M. FLOQUET is not only an anti-Clerical, but he has committed himself to vote for a Revision of the Constitution and for the suppression of the Senate. To the Moderates, who are the Conservatives of the Third Republic, this policy is as odious as the financial waste of the last few years, or as anti-Clericalism is to the Royalists. Nevertheless, M. FLOQUET has been chosen by a great majority, composed of Opportunists, Radicals, and Boulangists, who supported him because he is in favour of Revision of the Constitution. It is impossible to doubt that this indicates a disposition on the part of the new Chamber to follow the example of its predecessor. And yet the consequences of that course are sufficiently patent. At the last general election the votes given for the various Oppositions were, in spite of the most thorough-going bribery and pressure on the part of the Ministry, and in spite, too, of undeniable tampering with the returns, little more than a tenth less than the number given for the Government. As the Boulangists are themselves Republicans, and the Conservatives kept their particular principles in the background, it would be going too far to say that all the Opposition votes were anti-Republican. But, beyond all doubt, they were given against such a Republic as has afflicted France for the last seven years. They were given against bad administration and petty tyranny. It is at least not antecedently probable that the provocation will in the future produce other consequences than it has done in the past. Yet a majority of deputies has voted for a man who is as much to blame as any for that foolish policy. They have shown their indifference to financial reform by selecting a President who helped to produce financial disorder, and their fear of being called Reactionary by the Radicals by voting for an anti-Clerical. It is true that they assure the Moderates that the election is not to be understood as a declaration of policy. To such assurances there is but one answer—qui vivra verra—and in the meantime an ounce of action would be better than a bushel of promises.

The Royalist meeting on Wednesday is a sign that the Conservatives are still disposed to allow the majority time to show its hand before committing themselves to irreconcilable opposition. In spite of considerable opposition from some of the party, Mgr. FREPPEL persuaded a majority of the Royalists to promise to lay their Royalism aside for the present. The formation of a party simply calling itself the Right, and prepared to support a sound policy even though the Ministry is Republican, may on one condition be the result of this decision. It would be quite possible for Mgr. FREPPEL and his friends to coalesce for administrative purposes with M. LÉON SAY, and if the coalition receives the support of a solid section of the new members who are credited with the wish to “escape the tyranny of groups,” a genuine Conservative party may be formed in the Chamber, and the good sense, education, and manners of France will again have some chance of exercising their proper influence on Government. All, however, depends upon the “ifs.” If the new men fall into the old rut; if Opportunists and Radicals unite to treat Churchmen and Conservatives as enemies, and drive them to use the methods of open enemies, then the old warfare will begin again. The preliminary “verification of the mandates,” which has not yet got beyond the formal stage, which is the first work before the Chamber, will give the majority an opportunity of showing in what way they mean to use their power. If they proceed to invalidate the Conservative elections in an oppressive way, there will be nothing for it but a renewal of the much lamented “sterile agitation of parties,” in the midst of which all possibility of good administration will disappear. The Republican majority has now a last chance, and it cannot deny that the Conservatives are offering to help it to govern on acceptable terms. All that it is asked to do is not to make Government a mere tool in the hands of anti-religious fanatics, or to waste the substance of France in bribing the constituencies. The penalty of a refusal must be another, and in all probability a more bitter, Boulangist agitation, under this BOULANGER or another. Next time, too, there will be no Centenary of the French Revolution, no Paris Exhibition, to come to the help of the blunderers.

ARBITER APOLOGIARUM.

WE have always had a true affection for Mr. CONYBEARE, as all Unionists, and especially all Tory Unionists, are bound to have. In many other cases the blemishes of the Gladstonian character are assignable to causes which incline the well-balanced mind to excuses. This man might have been a good Tory, or a respectable Liberal-Unionist, if he had had the benefit of education; but, if you ask about Mr. CONYBEARE's education, the only possible answer must be, “Oh, what an educated man he is!” That man has been perverted by want of means; but Mr. CONYBEARE is understood to be quite in affluence. A third may be vexed by a sense that his merits have not been sufficiently rewarded; but that thought can never have occurred to so clear-sighted a man as the member for Camborne. So that Mr. CONYBEARE shows us the Gladstonian, him by himself, the kind of person who, circumstances having nothing to do with it, is by natural genius and temperament Gladstonified. And it is not with such a presentation that non-Gladstonians have cause to quarrel. Therefore, we have always loved Mr. CONYBEARE as a kind of automatic Helot of British politics, an unbribed awful example, a kind of Unhappy ELIZA of Salvation à la CAMPBELL BANNERMAN. But we have never loved him quite so much as since the publication of his little correspondence with Sir EDWARD CLARKE on Monday last. It is unnecessary to go into details of this published matter. It may suffice to say that Mr. CONYBEARE had, according to a gutter journal, charged Sir EDWARD with saying at Southwark to an audience of licensed victuallers that, if each of his hearers would spend half a crown in free drinks, he, Sir EDWARD, would be returned to Parliament, the gutteralist adding that Mr. CONYBEARE “said ‘he was able to prove this from shorthand notes taken at the meeting.’” If anybody expected that Mr. CONYBEARE would take this fighting, that body must have been sorely deceived. Mr. CONYBEARE climbed down with the alacrity, though hardly with the grace, of the most accomplished acrobat. He had said the offensive words (or their substance) twice; he was not responsible for the gutter journal; he accepted Sir EDWARD's assurance that the statement is absolutely false (let any gentleman, if he can, conceive the state of a man's ears and cheeks when he admits that he has made an “absolutely false” statement), and would tell the Camborne and Rotherhithe people so. This is sufficiently abject; but Mr. CONYBEARE is still Mr. CONYBEARE. He “need hardly add that, this being so, I am bound also to express ‘to yourself my regret for having circulated a statement ‘injurious to you, which you assure me is false [observe, not “which is false,” but “which you assure me is false”], ‘but which, owing to the way it came to me, I had reason ‘[what reason?] to believe was the fact.’”

The best comment on this will be furnished by the following (we believe) unpublished apologue:—

In one of the visits of heroes to the Shades (it is not certain which), the hero and his guide came to that well-known limbo which not yet embodied souls inhabit. And as they passed they saw a shade—a rather shaggy crabbed shade—which deeply did lament by Limbo Lake. And the hero, who was compassionate, said to the Sibyl, “Let us ask this shade why he laments.” So they asked him. And the shade said, “They have told me that many ‘centuries hence there shall be a member of Parliament ‘in the Kingdom of Britain, and that he shall belong ‘to a University to which I shall not belong, and that he ‘shall have concern in a matter which I know not, but ‘which shall be called from one DOPPING, and that his ‘name shall be Str—rr, and that I shall have nothing to do ‘with it. And, therefore, I weep for myself and that ‘other University to which I shall belong, and for the fair ‘town of Camborne in distant Cornwall, which it has ‘been revealed to me that I shall represent, though I ‘know not who I shall be. For when Camborne sees this ‘Str—rr and thinks that he is not I, it may be that Camborne will hate me.” And the hero, who was a soft-hearted hero, was affected by the plaint of the little shaggy crabbed shade, and turned to the Sibyl and said:—“Sibyl, can you ‘help him?” And thereupon a very remarkable expression came upon the Sibyl's countenance and she turned to the shade—the shaggy crabbed shade—and she spake to him in the Latin tongue (for they knew that he would receive a classical education) and said:—“Tu CONYBEARUS eris.” And after that there was no more to be said.

THE COLSTON BANQUETS.

THERE was, perhaps, no sufficient reason why Mr. GOSCHEN and Lord ROSEBURY, addressing their respective audiences of the “Dolphin” and the “Anchor” Societies, should have each wondered what the other was saying. By the exercise of a little reflection they might have guessed. Lord ROSEBURY might have divined that the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER would, among other things, be reciting the legislative achievements of the Government, and to the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER it might have been revealed that Lord ROSEBURY was ridiculing their record. The two speakers were excellently matched, and both, it may be admitted, did their work in a workmanlike fashion. If Lord ROSEBURY's “chaff” was less effective than Mr. GOSCHEN's statements, that is not the fault of Lord ROSEBURY, but of the intractable circumstances. He had to pick up his material for satire where he could find it; and if it was not of a very serviceable description, it was only so much the worse for him. The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER went, of course, through the familiar list of Ministerial measures—the Local Government Acts for England and Scotland, the Welsh Intermediate Education Act, the Scotch Universities Act, the Merchandise Marks Act, and so forth. His critic “over the way” asked what were the topics on which the Ministerialists were regaling themselves. Was it the Tithes Bill? Was it the Sugar Convention? Was it this, that, and the other? Now, Lord ROSEBURY being a man of sense as well as of humour, we are sure it is unnecessary to point out to him how ineffective a reply it is to a Minister's account of what his Government have done to point out what they have not done. No Administration in the world has ever succeeded in carrying all its measures; none that we know of has ever escaped the reproach of bringing in measures which it ought not to have expected to carry; few have ever been able to deny that they have brought in some measures which it would have been a misfortune if they had carried. When, therefore, Lord ROSEBERY sarcastically refers to two or three Bills which the present Government have brought in and failed to pass, he is simply attempting to manufacture a charge of political miscarriage out of what is no more than a mere reflection on the vanity of human effort. The only real way of answering the claim of a Government to have deserved well of their country by legislation is to show that their measures are either futile or mischievous or of overrated merit. Lord ROSEBERY, of course, cannot do this; in the first place, because his party have supported some of the Ministerial measures, and, in the second place, because even those which they have not supported they are afraid to condemn. But since he could not attack the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER's position in the only way in which he was the least likely to weaken it, we suggest that it would have been better to have left it alone. As a man of candour, indeed, he must be perfectly conscious in his mind that very few Governments of the last quarter of a century have ever, after three years of official life, had so few mistakes to reproach themselves with, and Lord ROSEBERY must know also that this very fact, though he himself is too good-tempered a politician to be troubled by it, is a source of the bitterest chagrin and disappointment to the more rancorous of his colleagues.

Except on the point with which we have been dealing, the two chief speeches at the Colston banquets hardly came into contact at all. Mr. GOSCHEN did, indeed, hint a curiosity, in which, with a slight modification of its object, we confess to sharing. He wondered whether the whips of the Jacobins and the party of Mr. LABOUCHERE were present at the "Anchor" dinner side by side with Mr. ARNOLD MORLEY. We, who now know that they were not, are equally entitled to wonder why. Lord ROSEBERY made very merry of the supposed dissensions among the Unionists; but he cannot suppose that the public regard his own party as the type of a united body, or that they will not ask themselves, with some amusement, what is the value of a "Liberal" function at which there does not appear to have been a single Jacobin present. It is true that, in the absence of the advanced section, Lord ROSEBERY ran lightly over their political programme, and did all that his wonted tact and skill could do to create the impression that to enumerate a list of projects on which a party was agreed that "something must be done" is the same thing as showing that they are agreed upon what to do. But this is a fact which it would overtax even Lord ROSEBERY's ingenuity to accomplish—at any rate, to the deception of an intelligent hearer. We are "much more forward" in our programme," he observed, in his airy manner, "than our opponents, and I think a look at the subjects from which the Liberal programme at the next election must be selected will convince you of the fact." So Lord ROSEBERY takes "a look" at that programme accordingly. "There is the dealing with the liquor traffic; there is land reform; there is registration; there is abolition of the plurality of votes which we call 'one man one vote'; there is the payment of members; there is—what I will not allude to for delicate considerations to-night—the London programme, which is a separate programme; there is disestablishment in Scotland and Wales; there is a drastic reform of the Second Chamber; there is, too, a group of questions which I would arrange under the head of workmen's questions, with which the party will have to deal more seriously than now, or they will find them dealt with in a separate school and in a different spirit." Yes, there are all these questions, but a series of problems is not quite the same thing as a list of solutions; and the little difficulty which Lord ROSEBERY omits to deal with resides in the fact that, with the exception of two or three of minor importance, there is not one of these problems on which it is in the least degree credible that the united Liberal party could possibly arrive at a common solution. Registration, plurality of votes, payment of members, and so forth, we may leave out of account. Neither Lord ROSEBERY, we presume, nor any one, expects to "sweep the country" on a policy of that kind. The "drastic reform of the Second Chamber" is a fad of Lord ROSEBERY's own, for which, in the form that commends it to his own taste, his Radical friends do not care a button, and which could not possibly be adapted to their tastes without repelling the other half of the party, and not improbably alienating Lord ROSEBERY himself. As to the Disestablishment in Wales and Scotland, we need only say that a good many voices hitherto silent have to be heard on that subject, and that it must not be assumed from the unchecked vapourings of the HARCOURTS and OSBORNE MORGANS of the party that they are all of one mind.

But it is not either of these questions, as everybody knows, that is the origin of the disintegrating force at work in the Gladstonian ranks. We must look for it in those other questions which Lord ROSEBERY handled as delicately as all tender places should be. We must look for it in what he called the "London programme" and the "group of questions which he would arrange under the head of Workmen's Questions." To the former "he would not allude, for delicate considerations"; and we can quite understand it, though, perhaps, he may not have meant exactly to indicate where the real delicacy exists. And then there is the workmen's questions, "with which the party will have to deal more seriously than now, or they will find them dealt with in a separate school and a different spirit." Yes; but what if the men of this school and spirit want to have a hand in them already? What if the whole cause of Mr. LABOUCHERE and the like of Mr. LABOUCHERE coming to the front is the conviction of the men of this school and spirit that Lord ROSEBERY and his official colleagues belong to a school from which they can expect nothing, and will deal with those questions in a spirit of timidity which they despise? Why these are the very questions which everybody outside the circle of complaisant Gladstonian officialism is asking, and yet Lord ROSEBERY thinks to produce a reassuring effect of harmony by making a speech which suggests these questions everywhere, and nowhere answers any of them in a manner from which a Gladstonian, anxious for the unity of his party, can derive the slightest satisfaction. Lord ROSEBERY said that the Gladstonians would be "playing the game of a fool—the game of our opponents" (probably an accidental epigram), "if at the moment they laid down their programme for the next election." We will not describe the game in any discourteous terms, and, indeed, we cannot say that it is their natural game, for it is not. We will confess ourselves that, if Lord ROSEBERY really wished to keep the Gladstonian programme dark until the eve of the next election, he has been much more communicative than he wished.

HOLE AND CORNER JUSTICE.

THE case of MALAN v. YOUNG, after occupying the time of a judge for three days, has been adjourned till the 13th of January, the third day of the Hilary sittings. All the public know, and all we are entitled to say, is that the action was brought for a libel, that the defendant is Headmaster of Sherborne, and that the plaintiff was an Assistant-master at the same school. But, although nothing more is certain, a great deal more is and will be the object of surmise and suspicion. Sherborne is, if not one of the great public schools, at least a well-known place of education, to which some hundreds of persons must have sent, or be intending to send, their sons. It is, of course, conceivable that Mr. YOUNG may have made defamatory statements, true or false, which concern only the private character of Mr. MALAN, and have nothing whatever to do with the boys. But, on the other hand, it may be that the libel, or alleged libel, has a direct bearing upon the discipline of Sherborne, or its morality, or both. It is certain that some persons besides the plaintiff and defendant are affected, because that was the express ground on which Sir CHARLES RUSSELL applied for a private hearing of the case. One inimitable result of Sir CHARLES's success must be that the worst and darkest suspicions will be widely entertained. Perhaps, if this case had been heard in the ordinary way, nothing would have come out to affect in the smallest degree the good fame of Sherborne. But the parties to this action have done the worst thing possible for the school in endeavouring to hush up what may be, for anything that appears, the most trumpery of personal quarrels. Not to bring an action, at whatever cost of undeserved individual suffering, for fear of damaging a cherished institution is an intelligible, and may be a highly honourable, form of abstinence. The aid of the law once invoked, secrecy can only do harm. A private arbitration might have settled the differences between Mr. YOUNG and Mr. MALAN without the public being any the wiser. The House of Commons, not unnaturally incensed by the speech of an Irish member, ordered the galleries to be cleared during a debate on the murder of Lord LEITRIM. The result was such that the experiment has never been, and in all probability never will be, repeated. Yet that the House had the power to do what it did is as clear as Mr. Justice DENMAN's position is doubtful.

But of course there are far graver questions involved in Mr. Justice DENMAN's decision than the present or future welfare of Sherborne. He has, if we understand him rightly, ruled that a judge may try any case in private, provided that both parties desire him to do so, and that there is no jury. That an action of libel should be tried without a jury is in itself strange, if not unprecedented; but we presume that a jury can now always be dispensed with if the parties agree. Neither Sir CHARLES RUSSELL nor Mr. LOCKWOOD, nor Mr. Justice DENMAN himself, cited a single instance of an action like this being tried with closed doors. The exceptions to the rule of publicity are, so far as we are aware, two, and two only. The first is an application for nullity of marriage, which the Ecclesiastical Courts heard in camera, and where the power of excluding the public is construed as having been extended by statute to the Probate and Divorce Division. The second is a case where the object of the suit would be destroyed by divulging the evidence, such as an injunction to restrain the disclosure of a patent or trade secret. Neither of these instances has the remotest connexion with the present circumstances. The second class of inquiries speaks for itself. The first usually involves painful and ignominious details, which can have no legitimate interest for any one. It is to be observed that the request to Mr. Justice DENMAN that he would have the Court cleared was not made on the ground of possible injury to public morals. The reason given was that third parties might be injured. This danger may occur in any action whatever, being plainly and inseparably incident to the administration of justice. Every one is liable to be attacked by a barrister in a wig, and for such a misfortune the law affords no redress. The risk of casual wrong to innocent people is regarded as a less serious evil than the restriction of an advocate in the discharge of his duty to his client. Moreover, it is ridiculous to say that strangers to the litigation should be protected before a judge alone, but not before a judge and jury together. Hitherto, both in London and at assizes, the most revolting cases have been heard in open court, women and children only being excluded. Respectable newspapers do not report indecent evidence, and if they did their proprietors could be punished. It is no defence to an indictment for obscene libel that the language impugned was used by a witness at a trial. More will be heard, and ought to be heard, of Mr. Justice DENMAN's ruling. He is said to have consulted other judges, but of course he is himself solely responsible. A fairer-minded or more impartial man never sat upon the Bench. But if it were once laid down that the doors of our Courts could be closed whenever the reputation of more or less important persons was concerned, general confidence in the administration of the law would be rudely shaken.

LADIES IN COURT.

A GOOD observer of mankind once observed that philosophers were insensible to irony. The time-honoured judicial irony of Baron HUDDLESTON in the action BESANT against HOSKYNs was decidedly wasted on those "ladies" to whom the choice was offered whether they should behave as decent women or not. They elected to brave the imputation, some half-dozen of these "ladies" in court, and remained seated when the judge said he thought "all respectable women had gone out of court." Perhaps they considered themselves philosophers, and entitled to hear the curious "Fruits" which the SOLICITOR-GENERAL, in the exercise of his duty, was compelled to lay before the jury. The sarcasm of the judge and the appeals of the jury were equally unavailing. The judge was understood to say he had not the power of ordering these persons out of court. If this is so, it is infinitely to be regretted. That women should have been present during the proceedings is a thing shameful enough, but that they should disregard the judge's innuendo, and the obvious rights of the jury to an unembarrassed hearing of the evidence, is scandalous in the extreme. The impudence of their behaviour has never been approached in these looser times in any court of justice. We have seen too much of late of the new species of court lady, the "lady in court," whose appetite for strange evidence is insatiable, whose hardihood of manners there is no possibility of shaming. But these specimens surpass the worst examples in the past. They are sunk, among the abandoned, to an abyss of degradation which we have hitherto conceived to be impossible. It is all very well for the judge to urge the old ungentle and keen hints of irony. What is it to them that he did not see any decent women remaining after the protest of a juror? The judge heard the impudent laughter with which they received his observation, and it is a thousand pities, we repeat, that he had not power to compel their removal or commit them for contempt, and put an end once for all to an infamous public scandal.

A GENTLEMAN AND A TORY.

SOME little time ago the Pope was claimed as a sympathizer by the advocates of boycotting and the Plan of Campaign with a result which is notorious; when they called him in to bless he did something else; but the subject is of so painful a nature to the Irish Nationalists that they cannot endure even the most indirect reference to it. The "Christian Socialists" next hailed him as a man and a brother; and they declared that, rather than see the masses drifting away from his Church, he would pose as the champion of labour versus capital. During the late strikes at the Docks Cardinal Manning came to the front as a mediator, and this was expected to be the prelude of further advances on the part of the Roman Catholic Church on behalf of workmen suffering under the tyranny of wealth. Within three weeks of the settlement of the Dockyard strikes the Pope spoke out on the position of the labouring classes. The occasion was his reception of a large body of French workmen within the halls of the Vatican, and there can be no doubt that what he said to them he would be as ready to say to the labourers of other countries, including our own. It must be distinctly understood that we are treating of the Pope here neither as Antichrist nor as the Father of All the Faithful, but simply as an old gentleman who for various reasons possesses some influence, and we wish to recommend his remarks to the attention, not only of Protestants, but also of Roman Catholics, whether laymen or priests.

Cardinal Langénieux headed the large pilgrimage of French labourers and artisans, and after reading their address, he begged the Pope to deign to make his own cause the workmen's cause. "You have told us," replied the Pope, "and it has given us great pleasure to hear it, that you wish in a formal manner to submit resignedly to toil and its hard conditions, to be invariably peaceable and respectful to your masters, whose mission it is to give you work and organize it, and to abstain from all unlawful actions." He showed them that, while Christianity denounced slavery, it regarded labour as the natural condition of man in this world, that to accept it with courage was an honour and a mark of wisdom, and to shrink from it with cowardice a dereliction of a sacred and fundamental duty. Far from representing the Founder of Christianity as the first Socialist, he said that He set them an example of the patient endurance of fatigue, hunger, thirst, and suffering. As to the rich man, as Tertullian put it, he "was created to be the treasurer of God upon earth," and "if he should close his heart against misfortune and poverty," there would be no danger of his escaping his deserts! But how was this treasurer, this representative of capital, to be connected with poverty and labour by an "indissoluble tie"? The Pope did not say by strikes, arbitrations, or a redistribution of wealth; but by "charity," which created the true social bond and gave it strength. To appraise the charity in the heart of the average capitalist is not our business on the present occasion; we are merely quoting the Pope. Charity, he continued, discovered "a remedy for all evils, a comfort for all griefs; and by its innumerable works and institutions, it succeeded in rousing, in favour of the unfortunate, a noble rivalry of zeal, generosity, and renunciation." And then followed these very unmistakable words:—"That was the single solution which, in the inevitable inequality between man and man, brought a bearable existence to each. For some centuries this solution was universally accepted and imposed upon all." What a doctrine for Hyde Park and green flags on a Sunday afternoon! "Without doubt," proceeded the Pope, "there were occasional uprisings of insubordination, but they were merely partial and circumscribed in action." The process of circumscription would, we fear, prove more forcible than agreeable to Christian Socialists; but it is clear enough that the "Pop of Room," as Mr. Charles Yellowplush used to call him, would not hesitate for a moment in applying it.

The Pope warned the French workmen against those "who, seduced by false doctrines, conceit to have found a remedy for their ills in the overturning of what constitutes the essence of political and civil society." There were "hundreds of workers" who held "seductive, though erroneous, theories," who propounded "subversive principles," and propagated "vain delusions." He did not say "even in the more respectable English monthlies"; but let that pass. "They are rushing blindly against immutable laws that nothing can destroy," "heaping up ruin and sowing on all sides discord and disorder." He gave a useful hint to Socialistic crotchet-mongers when he added, "Only in the faithful fulfilment of the duties imposed upon all classes of society, in the respect and guardianship of the functions belonging to each member, does the remedy lie." With the question of Trades-Unions and strikes he did not deal directly; but he suggested as a substitute "a revival, at least in their substantial aid and manifold possibilities for good, and under the forms permitted by the altered conditions of the times, of those guilds of arts and crafts which in days past benefited workmen, eased their toil, protected their rights, and defended, in needful measure, their lawful demands." In short, said he, "What we ask is that, by a sincere return to Christian principles, there should be established and consolidated between masters and servants, between capital and labour, such a harmony and such a union as are the only safeguard of their mutual interests." Finally, he recommended to the workmen "discipline, sobriety, a spirit of foresight, and household economy"; and not only did he bless themselves, but (apparently unasked) their masters also, their employers, and their benefactors. We had almost forgotten to mention that he alluded casually, though pointedly, to "the weakness and entirely domestic mission of the woman"! All those whom the Pope's words may concern would do well to bear in mind that they carry additional force from the fact that they had been deliberately written out beforehand, with the knowledge that the speaker, who has the fullest opportunities of ascertaining the spirit and temper of his subjects throughout the world, would be risking the alienation of thousands of weak-kneed Catholics, not only in France, but also in England, America (perhaps especially), and other countries. We are well aware that this Papal utterance would not be admitted by any Roman Catholic theologian to fulfil the conditions necessary to make it, technically speaking, ex cathedra—i.e. infallible—neither would the celebrated rescript to the Irish Bishops, for that matter; but the question to be submitted to every one calling himself a Catholic, with regard to both of these allocutions, is whether he does or does not profess to be loyal to the Pope. If he does, he has no longer an inch of room left to shuffle in on either matter.

Scarcely any notice has been taken of this speech in the English journals. Whether this is because the voice of the speaker has ceased to have much influence, or because his remarks are unpalatable, we will not inquire. As it stands, we do not think it will be altogether to the taste of a certain number of the Pope's nominal adherents, to say nothing of others; but, when taken in conjunction with the celebrated rescript against boycotting and the Plan of Campaign, it forms a valuable, a complete, and a damning test wherewith to try Roman Catholics, both lay and clerical, as well as Protestants professing to befriend Roman Catholics, when they endeavour to curry favour with either the English or the Irish lower classes, by tampering with the fundamental principles of morality.

THE SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT AGAIN.

OUR old friend the Special Correspondent always has his opportunity when it is somebody's interest to get up an "atrocious" agitation; and he has it now. As most people know, frantic efforts have been used during the last few weeks and months to manufacture a public belief that there is something very dreadful going on in Crete. But for a long time these laudable efforts were not crowned with even an appearance of success. Whether the right man was not on the spot, or whether his ingenuity and courage were not equal to his good will, or what was the cause, it is impossible to say. But atrocities did not "yield"; there was no money in them. At last, in the early days of last month, an effort was made. The Daily News received from its Special Correspondent at Canea something which it was thought would do. As was pointed out here at the time, the Correspondent's own statements, though abounding in big words, contained a singularly small modicum even of positive accusation, while the proportion of this modicum which was supported by any kind of evidence was infinitesimal. It served, however, as the seasoning to violent onslaughts on the wicked Turk, and it served also, as in the case of the Baptist ministers, either actually to deceive or to supply a pretext of self-deception to divers good people who began to assert, if not as proved facts, yet as solemnly brought charges, things which the Correspondent himself had only cautiously intimated as the vaguest hearsay. But such matter as this precious statement did contain was the other day blown to pieces by the careful and elaborate examination of Consul Biliotti. It seems to have been thought that something more must be done, and a fresh set of "revelations" arranged. They have come to hand duly, and it may be worth while to examine them a little.

Once more it is impossible not to admire the ingenuity of the form which these "revelations" take. The writer, whoever he may be, might with great justice say to anybody who understands evidence, "You can't accuse me of bearing false witness; for you see, if these fools do not, that for the most part I bear no witness at all." He begins by saying that "the Daily News' revelations of the Turkish excesses and horrors in Crete caused great confusion in the circles of the Turkish Government" (it has circles, probably, because it is a kind of hell). This is a stimulating kind of statement; it makes the reader think what a mighty organ he is reading, and feel greedy for more revelations. And further, it commits the person who makes it to absolutely or almost nothing. The circles of the Turkish Government may mean an office porter, or a cavass, or somebody who knows somebody who once lent money to an effendi, or anybody, or nobody. As the "revelations" originally "revealed" nothing at all but some gossip, it is impossible to say to what they refer. Then we are told that "the first step taken was to contradict the facts; but as this failed, accusations followed," and we are further informed, again without the slightest support of evidence, how Pasha This accused Bey That. Here, again, the thing sounds interesting and important. Examine it, and once more the whole shrivels up. Contradictions failed. How do contradictions fail? Besides, Consul Biliotti's contradiction did not fail, but very much the contrary. Who vouches for the Turkish recriminations? Nobody; not even the Correspondent, who, indeed, as we shall see, is too clever or too honest a gentleman to vouch for anything of the slightest importance. He proceeds to tell us that many persons are being put in prison; which, after an attempt at armed rebellion, is not very remarkable, and may well be believed. He says that churches have been desecrated and damaged, "sometimes in a most brutal manner." Apparently, therefore, this curious person thinks that desecration and damage to churches might be done in the manner of the sucking dove. Shakir Pasha has hauled down the flags—a proceeding again scarcely remarkable in a district under martial law. "Beating is still in full practice" (the vagueness of this is delicious), "and to make it more painful water is often poured over the body of the victim. The prisoners are often beaten hard on their way to the fortress, and are periodically scourged," with a not unusual result of scourging. Observe that these still mere generalities of the Macaulayan kind, which are perfectly consistent with the Correspondent's not knowing a single, or more than a single, actual case of the sort. Passing over one really precious piece of actual evidence, to which we shall return, we come to the statement (for a wonder, with names and dates) that peasants were shot because they did not stop when commanded. We repeat that this Correspondent may be anybody, we care not who. But we can tell him that, if he passes a soldier on duty in Germany, France, any Continental country, nay, in England itself, and does not stop when challenged, he will be in very considerable danger of exactly the same fate as the lamented Cretans. Then it seems "the gendarmes and soldiers run after the women with criminal intentions." "A great number of cases might be given" (ah! that "we could an we would"!). But the Correspondent, a man of the nicest honour, could not think of compromising ladies. Indeed, which rather takes the bloom off his chivalry, he has been "threatened with personal violence" if he does—the sacred person of a Special Correspondent threatened with violence! So the gendarmes continue to run after women with criminal intentions, of misprision of which criminal intentions we really fear that the Daily News' Correspondent, by his own confession, is guilty. Still, he knows a gentleman of high standing who confided to him that "his own sister, with two other young women, while returning from their olive-gardens, were fallen upon by soldiers, and had only, after a daring expedient, a narrow escape." Curiosity may pant and burn to know or imagine that daring expedient. But let us be silent, and, like the Correspondent, abstain from endeavouring to compromise the young lady who had a brother who was known to the Special Correspondent of the Daily News. Then, after charges (which are most likely true) of forced labour, of delation, and so forth, the Correspondent returns on his piece of resistance, to which he has referred before, but which he keeps in abstract as a bonne bouche. This is a document which purports to be the humble petition of Irene Papadopoula and others to the Turkish Governor of Rethymo—how, by the way, this agrees with the repeated assertions that Christians are afraid to complain, and that women especially will not tell their wrongs, the Correspondent does not explain. But this notable petition, oddly enough, does not contain even the assertion of what is commonly called outrage. Irene had hay made in her house, and was beaten. Charisto and her sister-in-law Helen were "attacked with lances." Chryse had a mule requisitioned. Angelika was "savagely assaulted, but saved by the appearance of neighbours." Another Irene's husband was fined, and the soldiers "wanted to take away" her goods to pay the fine; but it is not even said that they did so. (The fact of such trumpery as this being gravely inserted in the indictment is almost enough to show what it is like.) Catherine appears to have had bad language addressed to her, and to have suffered insults which the pudibund Correspondent "omits," but of which we may be sure he would have given a pretty clear idea if they proved what his party are longing to discover. Calle was assaulted, and had "a very narrow escape." It will be observed that Artemis protects the virtue of the Cretan women in the most wonderful manner, and that the Turkish soldier is a curiously unsuccessful satyr.

Yet let us set against all this intolerable quantity, not of sack, but of dirty ditchwater, one proven fact. The Daily News' Correspondent "witnessed a colonel beating a peasant simply because he did not make the Turkish salute to him." O genus humanum! Proh pudor! Papæ! Ototoi! Let nobody ever attempt to deny that atrocities reign in Crete after this. What no Russian colonel or cornet, no German in Africa or at home, no Frenchman in Algeria or in Indo-China, no Englishman in either Ind, no

Spaniard, Dutchman, Portuguese, plunger or planter, sahib or conquistador, ever thought of doing, the wicked Turk has done; and a soldier, standing on his dignity, has actually struck a "native" for not salaaming!

Such utter bosh as the greater part of this accusation, cleverly as it is arranged by the Correspondent, would hardly do quite by itself, so a fresh hand has to be called in. The leader-writer takes the Correspondent's matter and dresses it afresh for even more hasty readers. The Correspondent "does not deal in vague generalities"; he "gives chapter and verse for everything he describes" [especially the daring expedient of the sister of the gentleman of high standing]. The Correspondent "vouches his credit for the frequent occurrence of the violation of women." The voucher, as we have seen, is about equal to that which Mr. Wegg gave when he declined to explain—because Mrs. Boffin was present. "Our Correspondent saw a peasant severely beaten for not saluting a Turkish officer; and a reign of terror prevails through the island." The conjunction is bold, but almost too bold; for as it happens it sums up in a nutshell the whole matter. The Correspondent saw an act common everywhere where petulant military persons are in contact with a subject-population suspected of disaffection; and he deduces from that act a reign of terror over the island. The relation of the evidence to the charge could not be better put, unless indeed by the further Macaulayan generalization from Charisto's statement that the gendarmes "attacked with lances me and my sister-in-law Helen, who is pregnant, and now runs the risk of death." Charisto does not say that she was beaten; she does not say that Helen was beaten, but the leader-writer airily formulates what she does say into this:—"Among the more mentionable practices is that of beating such of the female population as happen to be with child." From which it would appear that Helen (who we sincerely hope has got over her fright) embodied the whole pregnant female population of Crete.

There would be a good deal more to say, if we had space, on this sort of thing:—for instance, on the singular conduct of the Times in allowing its Correspondent at Rome to fill his despatches with hearsay from Athens about Crete, instead of minding his own business. But the detailed examination—a little tedious, perhaps, but valuable—which we made of the latest charge-sheet against the Turks ought to display some of the secrets of this curious corner of Satan's Invisible World. First, the Special Correspondent, without, of course, committing himself to a falsehood, vamps up the facts; then the editorial commentator varnishes the vamping; then the good easy Baptist is induced to take the produce of this joint ingenuity for a watertight structure of sound sole leather.

MR. PINERO AS A DRAMATIC PROTECTIONIST.

IT is with some regret and surprise that we recognize the latest champion of the cause of Dramatic Protection in the person of Mr. Pinero. It has been the subject of well-deserved congratulation that, in the recent controversy on the question of allowing greater liberty to the music-halls as regards the performance of stage-plays, the example of the London theatrical managers of some twenty years back has not been imitated by their successors or by others who are concerned in preserving to the theatres their present monopoly; and that the question has hitherto been considered on its merits, and not on the grounds of self-interest. But at the recent dinner of the General Theatrical Fund Mr. Pinero, in replying to the toast of "The Drama," appears to have held, or to have fancied that he held, a brief on behalf of his good friends the managers of the London theatres, and accordingly delivered an address, more distinguished for energy than for good taste or logic, against the proposal to permit dramatic "sketches" on the stages of music-halls.

Now Mr. Pinero, though, of course, of no official position in this matter, is still a man whose remarks on such a subject will command attention. He has had many years' intimate practical experience of the stage, both as actor and author, and as the latter has attained a highly successful position; he should, therefore, on the question of theatrical free-trade know what he is talking about, and, at any rate, be sound as to his facts, even if he be not enough of a logician to draw from them the proper deductions. But when, for the edification of his fellow-guests under the presidency of Colonel North, he raised the cry of "Every art in its own temple!" he was probably so absorbed in the idea of preventing the music-halls from poaching on the preserves of the theatres that the question of the theatres committing similar depredations on the music-halls never occurred to him. But assuredly in this matter what is sauce for the goose should be sauce for the gander; whereas, under the existing state of things, a music-hall manager may not borrow from the stock-in-trade of a theatre, but the theatrical manager is privileged to make what raids he will on the music-hall—and pretty extensively he avails himself of that privilege. The pantomimes are full of music-hall "artistes," male and female, of music-hall songs, of music-hall business. Dozens of plays are in existence which consist of a "variety show" thinly disguised, with a feeble apology for a plot, as a stage-play. All that is asked for the music-halls is that they may be allowed to treat the theatres as the theatres have for years been treating them.

Mr. Pinero, however, appears to feel grave anxiety for the future of our drama if it is to endure the risk of contamination with the "vulgarity" and "frivolity" of the music-halls. As regards vulgarity he made haste to explain that he used the word "in a broad" (that is, we suppose, in a Pickwickian or Pinerian) "and not in a particular sense." What exact qualification that expression conveyed to the speaker's mind we cannot say; but, in spite of Mr. Pinero, we do not believe that vulgarity and frivolity are either the peculiar appanage of the music-hall, or are inseparably connected with its programmes. There are many performances given in theatres in which these qualities are sadly conspicuous—indeed, considering how freely the theatres borrow from the music-halls, that is not to be wondered at. "Cælum non animum mutant qui trans mare currunt," and a music-hall singer and his (or her) répertoire and style will remain much the same whithersoever you transfer them. There is no mysterious virtue in the very name of a theatre to refine and exalt whoever and whatever comes upon its stage, any more than there are contrary agencies at work in the music-hall. It is very easy, especially if you are addressing an audience whose interests are mainly with the theatres, to indulge in cheap sneers at the music-halls and their entertainments, and at the "order of mind" and "the intellects which, to put it mildly, have no very ardent æsthetic craving," by which those halls are supported; and Mr. Pinero's remarks appear, from the published accounts, to have given pleasure to those ears to which they were addressed; but when through the newspaper reports they reach a wider and less prejudiced circle than the convives of the Hôtel Métropole, the lack of accuracy in the facts and the lack of consequence in the arguments become sadly apparent.

It is all very well to enunciate the axiom that "a music-hall entertainment must always be a frivolous entertainment"; but the plain facts both of the past and of the present—facts which cannot but be known to a man of Mr. Pinero's experience and keen observation—tell us the exact opposite. Whenever, in their struggles to enlarge and vary their répertoires, the music-hall managers have succeeded in introducing any higher form of entertainment, anything more nearly resembling the "stage-play," their audiences have always welcomed the innovation with enthusiasm. The operatic selections given in bygone years at the Canterbury and Oxford Halls were gratefully welcomed by "frivolous" and "unæsthetic" spirits, until the "dog-in-the-manger" policy of the London theatrical managers, which Mr. Pinero so heartily endorses, invoked the aid of an antiquated statute, framed to prevent the singing of Jacobite songs in taverns in the reign of George II., and therewith, under the guise of solicitude for the highest interests of the drama, smothered what they feared as a dangerous rival in trade.

And as in the past, so now in the present. The plot of the little "sketch" which became a bone of contention during the recent licensing proceedings of the County Council has been given in detail during the newspaper correspondence those proceedings evoked; and it is certain that, if we may fairly judge of "dramatic sketches" from the example of "The Stowaway," and of the temper and taste of music-hall audiences from the reception of that "interlude" (and we see no reason why we should not so judge), it is certain, we say, that to call these places and their patrons essentially vulgar and frivolous is a mere reckless exercise of abuse which comes with specially bad grace from the self-constituted champion of the theatre; who, before using these hard words, might well have reflected whether they could by any possibility be applied to his own clients; whether frivolity could, or could not, be associated with farcical comedy, or vulgarity with opéra-bouffe or three-act burlesque. In the opinion of Mr. Pinero, to carry a stage-play, or a portion of a stage-play, to a music-hall, and place it in the same programme with the comic song of "Ask a P'liceman" is an outrage on common sense and good taste; but his experience must be able to supply him with many instances where the comic song has been transplanted from the music-halls, and has flourished in the theatres alongside of, or incorporated into, the stage-play; indeed, we seem to recollect some such incident in his own play of the Schoolmistress. The state of affairs, in fact, as Mr. Pinero and those who think with him would have it remain, reminds one of John Leech's picture of the Chartist and the special constable:—"If I kill you, it's nothing; but if you kill me, by Jingo, it's murder," says the latter, and that is in effect the position from the point of view of the theatre. "If I annex your performers, your tunes, your jokes, and fill my stage with them, it's nothing; but if you infringe on my répertoire to the extent of five minutes of dialogue from some old, forgotten farce, by Jingo! it's flat burglary, and a law which was never framed to touch you shall be launched on your devoted head."

The arguments which Mr. Pinero used in support of his plea for protection are the old stock-in-trade of the man in possession which were used in defence of the patent theatres in bygone years, and which one hoped had long ago been consigned to the limbo they merit. Permit stage-plays to be performed in a music-hall, and you "carry the drama into a region where its refinements would be rejected, and its dregs demanded." This statement was, we are told, received with cheers by the guests presided over by Colonel North; why, it would be difficult to say, unless because their interests prompted them to adopt the onesided views of the speaker as their own. If we except a few playhouses, specially patronized by the fashionable world, the frequenters of our music-halls and of our theatres are drawn from the same source, are composed, in fact, of the same individuals; the sentiment they applaud in the theatre they would applaud in the music-hall, just as in the pantomime at the theatre they roar at the antics which amuse them all round the year in the music-hall. Mr. Pinero suggests that to degrade the drama by placing it in a music-hall is analogous to taking down a graceful picture from the walls of a museum and hanging it in a public-house; but we must say we see no analogy whatever between the two cases. There is no intention of robbing the theatres of any of their attractions; to remove a painting from a gallery would leave on its walls a blank such as no stage reformer desires to create in the playhouse; all that is asked is that the music-hall, or the public-house, to follow Mr. Pinero's analogy, should be made brighter and more cheerful by a copy of the beautiful picture in the museum. It is, no doubt, as easy and congenial a task for a superior person to sneer at a public-house as at a music-hall, but both are absolute necessities to a large section of the community, and may, if properly conducted, be made pleasant and harmless places for their frequenters. The man with a cellar and club of his own scoffs if the "order of his mind" be narrow and prejudiced at the public-house, as the man whose interests are involved in the theatres ransacks his vocabulary for terms wherewith to disparage the music-halls; but the disinterested and unbiassed must admit that, as a public-house (we still adhere to the analogy of Mr. Pinero's choice) would be none the worse, but decidedly the better, for the adornment of graceful pictures, so a music-hall would benefit by the introduction of the drama upon its stage. Why should the position of affairs between the two forms of amusement be so one-sided—all give and no take? Let the theatres give some equivalent for all their annexations from their rivals—such an exchange would create a favourable stir in many markets of labour. There are authors to whom the preparation of such sketches would afford occupation, actors at present idle owing to the congested state of theatrical business who would find employment on the music-hall stage; but above all advantages would be the improvement of public taste which, we believe, would surely accrue from the elevation of the music-hall programme.

Mr. Pinero, with his lofty boasts of the high aims of dramatic art, and his tender solicitude lest his nursling should be injured by undue contact with the rude surroundings of the outside world, reminds us of a missionary, full of belief in the truth of his religion, but hesitating to promulgate it among the heathen for fear it should become deteriorated in the process. If the English drama deserves one half the polite things which Mr. Pinero and his friends say of it (and we have no reason to doubt that it does deserve them), it seems to us but a poor compliment to it to keep it, as it were, under a glass case like a delicate exotic. Let it go forth and spread itself abroad; the more roofs beneath which it makes its influence felt the better for it, the better for those who enjoy its representation, and (though Mr. Pinero may think otherwise) the better for those who live by its exercise.

ADVERTISING POLITICIANS AND THE POST OFFICE.

THE honourable member for Canterbury can scarcely be congratulated on a pamphlet entitled "Postal Reform: Sixty Reasons for an Inquiry by a Select Committee, prepared by J. Henniker Heaton, M.P. for Canterbury," recently issued from the press of Messrs. Harrison & Sons, and largely made up of réchauffés of those questions in Parliament to which the Postmaster-General has so often replied in such a crushing manner as to leave the honourable member below the gangway discomfited amid the laughter of the House.

The fact is, Mr. Heaton has had his day. He has now for some sessions wasted the time of the House of Commons by asking ridiculous conundrums concerning the Post Office. The House has found him out long ago; and now the public has better means than ever in its reach for also finding him out—to wit, the afore-mentioned "Sixty Reasons for an Inquiry by a Select Committee."

We have not, as our readers will readily believe, started on the unenviable task of obstructing postal reform; on the contrary, wherever reform can be shown to be possible, we should be the first to support the demand for it. But the advertising politician and the anomaly-monger are not quite the kind of persons to bring about reform; rather will they draw down ridicule on any cause, and so render reform almost impossible. As far as Mr. Heaton and his assistants have succeeded in making it clear what the member for Canterbury wishes to persuade the public to want, the desideratum may be expressed in three words—Ocean Penny Postage. Now not only is Ocean Penny Postage a chimera, but it is an exploded chimera. Once and again during the last thirty years the idea has been forced upon public attention by notoriety-hunters, and once and again the common sense of the public has risen superior to the unstatesmanlike suggestion. The public have never shown the slightest hankering for Ocean Penny Postage, for the public here are not the sort of people to want to pay exorbitantly for the conveyance of other people's letters. Even with a vast empire such as England, and England alone, possesses, the need for cheap communication with places beyond sea is restricted in its area compared with the need for communication within the kingdom. Nothing could better exemplify this than Mr. Heaton's thirty-third "Reason," meant to enforce just the opposite:—"That whereas friend writes to friend in England forty letters a year, Australians write to England but one letter each in two years, though half the people were born in Great Britain and Ireland." Mr. Heaton, M.P., & Co. do not see that, following their own little ciphering method to its limits, Ocean Penny Postage (in both directions) would only, by reducing the rate from 4d. to 1d., give as a result that Australians should write to England one letter each in six months, as against twenty written in the same time by "friend to friend" in England. But, as a matter of fact, even that poor result could not for a moment be anticipated; because we should not have from Australia, even at a postage of 1d., Christmas bills, and lawyers' letters, and invitations to dinner, and tradesmen's circulars, and all those unimportant private and business communications which, flowing into our houses and offices all over the kingdom from once to twelve times a day, make up the mass of letters that "friend writes to friend." No, most sapient sir! when Jack Happygolucky "makes tracks" for the antipodes and does not write home for two years, it is because he does not feel the impulse, not because he could not raise 4d. just as easily as 1d. for all practical purposes.

And because cheap postage to places beyond sea is not a necessity that presses on any considerable section of the community, the community naturally says, or tacitly implies, "Let those who want to send letters beyond sea pay their own postage, as nearly as you Government gentlemen can arrange it in reason; don't tax us, the community at large, for the sake of the few that write letters abroad." For that, be it remarked, is the true issue. According to Mr. Heaton's fifty-sixth "Reason," the establishment of Ocean Penny Postage to all parts of the Empire and to America would only cost 60,000*l.* a year; but even that sum, if relinquished from postal revenue, must be raised by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in some other way; and what tax could be less obnoxious or more reasonable than the charge which falls on the person receiving the quid pro quo?

Setting aside the question of Ocean Penny Postage, we come to that of revising the foreign and colonial postage rates in some other sense. That is quite another matter, and one where England is not as free to follow her own theory as might be supposed. It is an unquestionable fact that she has fallen behind the fashion in this matter. It seems that the general International Postal Treaty allows different nations to undersell each other within certain limits; that is to say, it is optional whether, to places beyond sea (India for example), the postage is fixed at 2½*d.* or 5*d.* France and Germany choose to fix it at 2½*d.*; England at 5*d.*, on the good ground that the transit to India costs vastly more than the transit to Europe. Now there is a great deal to be said for a universal rate (of say 2½*d.*) applicable to places abroad, as a matter of compromise and convenience; and it is well worth considering whether England can afford, much longer, to remain behind France, Germany, and other nations in this matter of the cost of sending letters to England's own possessions. Here, then, is a fair arena for discussion, and one which no obstruction of "permanent officials" ought to be allowed to block for a moment. Should the public really show a desire to apply some of the Post Office revenue to such an end—that is, to tax the community for the benefit of the foreign-letter-writer—it will be for the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Postmaster-General to see to ways and means, and to let the public know the probable cost of such a change. Not that the matter would end there; the Secretaries of State for India and the Colonies would clearly have much to say on the subject, for the interests of the Empire beyond sea are concerned equally with those of the mother-country.

It will be necessary to sweep down the cobwebs woven by the anomaly-monger, and brush away the buzzflies that blunder about, struggling for notice. That process will show that many of the so-called postal anomalies are the natural result of differences of national institution, feeling, theory, currency, or what not, very convenient for advertising politicians, but wholly barren of instruction.

The greatest of all postal anomalies is this—that, whereas it costs a penny to send a letter by post from Charing Cross to the Bank, it costs a penny and no more to send one from the Isle of Wight to the Orkneys; but that is scarcely a sixty-first "Reason for an Inquiry by a Select Committee, prepared by J. Henniker Heaton, M.P." It is a highly satisfactory anomaly, and so are many of the facts mentioned in the shallow pamphlet into which we have been dipping. Not so the comments of the honourable member. Take "Reason" No. 30, for instance:—"The cost to the British Government for the carriage of mails to America now amounts to 100,000*l.* per annum, and the receipts exceed 185,000*l.* per annum, leaving a profit of 85,000*l.* a year." "Profit," quotha? How about the cost of carrying the letters from all parts of the kingdom to Liverpool or Queenstown, and the answers from Queenstown or Liverpool to all parts of the kingdom? The honourable member who aspires to be thought an authority on the Post Office has yet, then, it seems, to learn the elementary fact that the collection, conveyance, and delivery of letters in the United Kingdom cannot be done for nothing. He has yet to be told that under the Postal Union system each nation keeps its own postage collections, so that practically the postage levied on a letter from England to America has to pay not only land and sea charges on that letter, but land charges on the answer when it comes for delivery. According to the Postmaster-General's last Report, there was a loss of over 32,000*l.* in the last financial year, on this very American business for which Mr. Heaton claims a profit of 85,000*l.* Perhaps the best reason for a Select Committee is to be found in the opportunity which it would afford for exploding the fallacies of advertising politicians.

SPANISH FINANCE.

IN the Budget which he laid before the Cortes about a fortnight ago, Señor Gonzalez, the Finance Minister, took a very optimistic view of Spanish finance. Whether his optimism is sincere, or whether he thought it wise to make the best of a difficult position, is open to question. Last May he proposed a very large scheme for the reorganization of the finances. One of his proposals was to sell public property, another to convert the redeemable debt, and a third to impose fresh taxes. The Opposition was powerful enough, however, to prevent him from carrying any of his measures, and he was obliged to content himself with the Budget of the preceding year. It is generally expected that the Cortes will be dissolved early next year, and the Opposition naturally believes that disordered finances will tell powerfully against the Government. They exerted all their efforts, therefore, with success in a policy of obstruction during the last Session, and they are expected to continue the same policy now. It may be that his knowledge of the attitude of the Opposition convinced the Finance Minister that he would be able to carry no important measures; at all events he has introduced a more modest Budget. Upon paper he shows an anticipated surplus of a little over half a million sterling, the revenue being estimated at somewhat over 803 millions of pesetas—that is to say, somewhat more than 32 millions sterling, the peseta being the equivalent of the French franc. He tells the Cortes that he has been able to effect considerable reductions of expenditure; but he admits frankly that he and his predecessor endeavoured to enforce retrenchment for some years past, and yet that supplementary estimates amounted to as much as the economies introduced. In other words, the expected reductions were not carried out in practice. It is exceedingly doubtful whether more success will attend the economical efforts of Señor Gonzalez next year. If, indeed, a change were introduced in the policy of the Government it might be hoped that retrenchment could be effected, but as no political changes are made it is difficult to see how the economies can be carried out. In the next place the Minister hopes that the existing taxes will prove more fruitful next year. He tells us that, in his opinion, the commercial and agricultural crisis through which Spain has been passing for some years is now drawing to an end; and, in fact, he finds that since July there has been an increase in the yield of the taxes. It is, no doubt, true that the revival in trade which has made so much progress here at home is now extending all over the Continent, and it is reasonable to expect that Spain will share, to some extent at least, in the general improvement, more particularly as the harvest of this year was good. But whether the trade revival will make so much progress within the next year and a half as to affect the revenue so materially as is expected by the Minister is very doubtful. At all events it is questionable policy of a Chancellor of the Exchequer to count upon a great increase in the yield of the taxes when improvement began to show itself only so lately as last July. In the third place, Señor Gonzalez proposes an increase in certain taxes, and an enhanced duty upon imported wheat. There is a very strong agitation in favour of higher duties in Spain, and even several supporters of the Government desire a more pronounced Protectionist policy. The Minister himself is not favourable to this agitation; but, in the hope of satisfying his own supporters, and winning over some of the dissentient Liberals, he yields so far as to propose an increased duty upon wheat.

In his desire not to give an advantage to his opponents Señor Gonzalez announces that he will not have recourse for the present to a public loan, and he expresses his confidence that he will be able to meet all the obligations of the Government. It is clear, however, that he can do so only by obtaining advances from the Bank of Spain, or the Tobacco Régie, or from some foreign houses. The floating debt, in fact, has become dangerously large already. In the middle of 1887 it was about 85 millions of pesetas. On the 1st of this month it is reported by the Minister himself to have risen to nearly 214 millions of pesetas, and he admits that when the accounts of the financial year 1888-89 are completely regulated it will be not less than 240 millions of pesetas. In 1889-90—that is, the current year—there will be a further large increase; for, as stated above, the Minister was unable to carry his Budget for this year, and it is admitted by all parties, therefore, that there must be a large deficit, variously estimated from 70 to 80 millions of pesetas. In the course of a few months, therefore, it seems probable that the floating debt will amount to about 320 millions of pesetas, or, roughly, 13 millions sterling. Some of the Madrid papers point out, however, that even these figures, large as they are, do not represent the whole truth; for they do not include the advances made to the Government by the Bank of Spain and by the Tobacco Régie. The papers referred to maintain that already the floating debt amounts to very little short of 400 millions of pesetas, or 16 millions sterling, and that it will increase within a few months by another 100 or 150 millions of pesetas. Remembering that the whole revenue of Spain is estimated by the Minister at very little over 32 millions sterling, it is clear that this floating debt is dangerously large, and it cannot be carried very much longer without a funding operation. The Government has been in negotiation with bankers in Paris, London, and Berlin for raising a foreign loan; but hitherto it has not been successful, for the terms asked by foreign bankers have been more onerous than the Government has been willing to accept. This is not wonderful. Indeed, the surprising thing is that foreign bankers should entertain a proposal for bringing out a new Spanish loan without guarantees that the whole policy of the Government would be changed. It is clear that Spain is spending much more than she can afford, and that, unless her policy is changed, her position will grow more and more desperate. It is only a few years ago since she made a compromise with her creditors, and the compromise was agreed to expressly on the ground that she was not able to pay more than she then offered to do. Ever since that compromise was entered into she has been adding to her debt in one way or another; and, if a fresh loan is raised now, she will go on in the old path, and before many years are over will make another demand upon the money markets of Western Europe.

Her difficulties are due to the ambitious views of her rulers, and the poverty of her people. The Government wishes to play a greater part in the world than it can afford to do. It is, therefore, keeping up an expenditure too great for the population. On the other hand, the taxpayers are exceedingly unwilling to contribute to the necessities of the country, and there is therefore a perpetual war between the tax-collector and the taxpayer. Partly, as already stated, this is due to the poverty of the people, but partly, also, it is the consequence of an evil system of administration. The whole fiscal system requires to be reformed at the same time that large retrenchments ought to be introduced. The Protectionist policy of the country is injurious to its trade, and, unfortunately too, Spain has suffered from the general depression that has weighed upon Europe for so many years. It has also had several bad harvests. But even if the revival in trade extends to Spain, and there is a large increase in the business of the country, it will still be necessary to introduce large economies if an equilibrium of revenue and expenditure is to be brought about. In the present Budget, for example, the charge for the public debt amounts to 281½ millions of pesetas—that is, to about 11½ millions sterling—the total of the revenue being only about 32 millions sterling. The charge for the army and navy again amounts to about 175 millions of pesetas, or 7 millions sterling; and the charge for public works amounts to 87½ millions of pesetas, or about 3½ millions sterling. The charge for the debt, public works, army and navy, therefore, costs about 211½ millions sterling out of a total revenue of 32 millions sterling. Little reduction can, of course, be effected in the charge for the debt. The conversion of the redeemable debt might effect some saving, and the funding of the floating debt would do more. But still economies of this kind would not count for much. The real direction in which retrenchment can be materially effected is in public works, the army, and the navy. Unfortunately the Government does not think it safe to reduce the army, because of the Carlist feeling in the North and the Republican feeling in the South. There remains, therefore, only the navy and public works in which much saving can be effected. And no Ministry of any party seems disposed to carry out the retrenchments in these which are required. Such being the state of affairs, it is to be feared that the finances of Spain will go from bad to worse. Yet it is curious to observe that during the past few years the price of Spanish bonds has risen in the Continental and London markets nearly 50 per cent., and even in the present year, though there has been a decline, the fall has been quite trifling. Apparently the great financial houses on the Continent, feeling sure that sooner or later the Government must come to them for a loan, have been supporting the market in spite of the difficulties of Spain. They know that a great fall would alarm investors and would make impossible a considerable loan. But if the price is maintained they hope that the public will believe that matters are not so bad as they are reported to be by the press, and that, therefore, investors will be induced to subscribe to the new issue. It is to be hoped that investors in this country will not be deceived by the apparent confidence, which is not really felt, of the great financial authorities. Spain, no doubt, has great undeveloped resources, and with wise statesmanship and a good system of administration might yet become a rich and prosperous country. But, until the administration is improved and a more statesman-like policy is adopted, it will be well for investors to let Spanish bonds alone.

EXHIBITIONS.

THE instinct which in childhood made us all want to take the music-box to pieces will be gratified by an inspection of the very interesting collection of studies for pictures which has been brought together this week at the Galleries of the Fine Art Society. A prefatory note to the Catalogue says that applications were made to all the principal artists of the day, and that their replies revealed the fact that a very small minority make use of this preparatory stage. Most painters, we fancy, make a first sketch in oil, or merely draw in charcoal on the canvas itself. We have rarely seen a collection of this kind which was more interesting. Mr. W. B. Richmond opens the show with studies, mostly in chalks on dark-brown paper, for the largest of his pictures. We see his relation to the art of Sir Frederick Leighton very plainly in these refined and scholarly drawings. A head of Lord Sherbrooke in pencil (1) is extremely delicate. We pass a beautiful silver-point by Mr. Sainton of a boy reading (10) to reach the space dedicated to some twoscore examples of Mr. Burne Jones. Of his draperies, we seem to have seen more characteristic specimens than these, but never finer studies of flowers, such as the lilies in No. 13 and the severely-drawn heroic roses in No. 17. If we were not distinctly told that the admirable compositions here signed by Mr. Frank Dadd were studies for water-colour paintings, we should be inclined to suppose them sufficient unto themselves as pictures in ordinary black and white. We are delighted to see Mr. Dadd's fine drawings; but they hardly seem to us to come into the category of studies.

A whole wall is dedicated to the work, in many kinds, of Professor Legros. Nothing comes amiss to this active hand, from the sweep of a broad wet brush to the almost invisible touch of the silver-point. No one has ever, we suppose, denied style to Professor Legros; but his work is mannered and even stilted, and too far from nature for the amount of beauty which he chooses to put into it. Those who delight in his landscapes, which seem as if they had come out of some old Italian portfolio, will find pleasure in "Twilight on the River" (46), and in "A Glade in the Forest" (58). Mr. G. D. Leslie reveals himself as a much fresher artist in chalk than those who only know his glossy clean pictures would suppose. Here is a frame, called "Bedtime" (73), containing two studies of the attitude of a woman carrying off a child under her arm, which are simply exquisite. One shows the group seen from one point of view, in charcoal, the second from another, and in sanguine; the latter is simply one of the most perfect things in the room. The artist, however, who, on the whole, shows to most advantage at the Fine Arts Society is indubitably Sir Frederick Leighton. If we were obliged to fix on one example as the most interesting in the room, it could hardly fail to be the long study (87) in pencil on brown paper, with white lights, made so many years ago for "The Procession of the Blessed Virgin of Cimabue." This, with the "Music" (86) and the "Dance" (88), reveals the extraordinary delicacy of the President's touch, his accurate draughtsmanship, and the almost microscopic power of his eyesight. Besides these merits, there is manifest in these beautiful drawings, which every critic of Sir Frederick Leighton should study, the intellectual quality of exquisite refinement, of a taste under perfect manual control. These are early works, but the rude figure of a girl (100), drawn for "A Sibyl" and dated 1889, shows that Sir Frederick Leighton, though perhaps he now avoids such very minute design as he affected in early youth, is not less a master of delicate draughtsmanship than he was. Some pencil studies by Mr. Watts divide the group of Leightons from a group of Alma Tademas. These last are vigorous, but they have not the charm of refinement, and in some way they fail to suggest the radiant colour which the painter succeeds in getting when he turns to his final medium.

There appear to be few artists at present who sketch in pastel; but this seems to be the method of Mr. Albert Moore, whose "Dressing-Room" (111), with its fine tints of lemon-yellow, is very effective. It is very interesting to note the manner in which Sir James Linton was working eight or nine years ago, when he made what we are sorry proved to be his ephemeral determination to win a position as an oil-painter. The studies in pink and grey chalk of mediæval soldiers for the "Surrender" (120, 123) are exceedingly striking; and so is the study of a nude female figure dancing, which recalls his famous picture of 1881. Nearly the whole of a wall is devoted to the serious and learned studies of Mr. Poynter, over which the amateur will love to linger. Last, but not least, the visitor must not omit to admire the curious and powerful studies by Mrs. de Morgan (Miss Evelyn Pickering) in white, or more frequently in gold-coloured, chalk upon black paper. We have rarely seen a finer study of armour than No. 163, nor an imaginative design more original and striking in execution than those strange golden designs, "Luna" (169) and "The Angel of Death" (168). Mrs. de Morgan has only to paint as well as she draws to win a place much higher than she now occupies, respectable as that is.

In reviewing the present show of French and Dutch paintings at Messrs. Dowdeswell & Dowdeswell's Galleries a fortnight ago, we made use of an expression which appears to have been misconstrued. It is notoriously difficult, in the cases especially of the deceased French masters, to draw the line between poor examples of the master's own brush and works executed in the studio or finished by pupils. In the spring we cordially praised the very fine collection of these particular masters which Messrs. Dowdeswell & Dowdeswell brought together. It is, we think, beyond contradiction that they have not succeeded in repeating that happy experiment, and whether we were strictly correct or no in thinking that some of the examples now on view are "dubious," we cannot but think that many of them are not in the truest sense characteristic.

NOTES FROM THE ZOO—THE AYE-AYE.

THERE are many animals in the Zoo whose habits are so completely nocturnal that, for all that the ordinary visitor can see of them, they might as well have remained in their native haunts. Certainly not the least interesting of these is the Aye-Aye (Cheiromys Madagascariensis); in fact, there are few, if any, more interesting animals in the collection, and, unfortunately, there are none that are less often seen, as the animal in question remains in a semi-torpid condition during the day in the box at the top of its cage in the Monkey-house, never by any chance moving out, or indeed showing itself. In consequence, visitors see nothing but an apparently empty cage; those, however, who are observant will notice that this cage, unlike the neighbouring wall-cages in which the lemurs are confined, is backed with patched zinc, and contains a bough which has been much gnawed as if by a rodent, the marks of its occupant's nightly amusements.

The Aye-Aye, as its scientific name implies, is a native of Madagascar, and was long a puzzle to naturalists, owing to its many peculiarities of form and structure. Its dentition is most curious, and much resembles that of the rodents. It has only eighteen teeth, of which the four front ones, two in the upper and two in the lower jaw, are much like those of a rat—Cuvier compared the lower teeth to ploughshares—these powerful incisors or cutting-teeth are used for cutting away wood, making holes in branches, and also for gnawing through the stems of sugar-canes and similar plants; the ears are very large, round, and open, and have, not inaptly, been compared to those of a bat; the eyes are wide and staring; and—a fact which adds to the weirdness of the animal's appearance—it possesses a perfect, that is an uncleft, upper lip. Its feet, however, especially the fore-feet or hands, are amongst its most striking peculiarities, the latter, indeed, being unlike those of any other animal; all the fingers and toes, with the exception of the hallux or great toe, which, like that of all the quadrupeds, is opposable, and has a flat nail, are furnished with long, compressed claws; but—and herein lies the great peculiarity—the third and fourth fingers of the hands are very long, the fourth being the largest and longest, while the third is so extraordinarily thin and wasted in appearance that, to quote Professor Owen, it seems as if it were paralysed. The animal is about three feet in length, including the tail, which is long and bushy—longer, indeed, than the body; and the whole creature, with the exception of its ears, nose, and the soles of its feet and the palms of its hands, is covered with thick dark fur.

It was discovered by the French naturalist and traveller Sonnerat about one hundred years since, who gave it the name Aye-Aye from an exclamation of the natives on seeing it. He obtained a pair, male and female, which he kept for two months, feeding them only on boiled rice. He evidently observed them very closely, and left a good description of their appearance and habits in confinement. In his opinion, the Aye-Aye did not approach any genus, but leaned towards the maki, the squirrel, and the ape. He made the curious mistake, however, of imagining it to be a subterranean animal. Buffon, who tells us that he examined the skin of one which Sonnerat presented to the Cabinet du Roi, considered that it was allied to the squirrel, and also that it bore some relation to the tarsier, and accordingly placed it among the rodents. Cuvier first placed it next to the flying-squirrel, and immediately before the rat, but afterwards in the list of doubtful animals. Schreber was the first to class it among the lemurs, and named it Lemur psilodactylus—a name adopted by Shaw—while Sonnini, who formed the genus Cheiromys, observed, rightly, that it was the only species known. Most naturalists, however, continued to class it among the rodents, until, in the year 1859, Professor Owen placed it in its present position as the sole representative of the last of the three families into which the Lemuroidea—the second sub-order of the Primates—are divided.

Professor Owen's Aye-Aye was obtained for him by Dr. Sandwith, who, while the animal was in his possession, observed its habits very closely, and wrote an extremely interesting account of them, from which the following is an extract:—"I thought that those strong rodent teeth, as large as those of a young beaver, must have been intended for some other purpose than that of trying to eat his way out of a cage, the only use he seemed to make of them besides masticating soft fruits. Moreover, he had other peculiarities, e.g. singularly large naked ears directed forwards as if for offensive rather than defensive purposes; then, again, the second finger of the hands is unlike anything but a monster supernumerary member, it being slender and long, half the thickness of the other fingers, and resembling a piece of bent wire. Excepting the head and this finger, he closely resembles a lemur. Now as he attacked every night the woodwork of his cage, which I was gradually lining with tin, I bethought myself of tying some sticks over the wood-work, so that he might gnaw these instead . . . they were bored in all directions by a large and destructive grub . . . presently he came to one of the worm-eaten branches, which he began to examine most attentively, and bending forward his ears and applying his nose more closely to the bark, he rapidly tapped the surface with the curious second digit as a woodpecker taps a tree, though with much less noise, from time to time inserting the end of the slender finger into the worm-holes as a surgeon would a probe. At length he came to a part of the branch which evidently gave out an interesting sound, for he began to tear it with his strong teeth. He rapidly stripped off the bark, cut into the wood, and exposed the nest of a grub, which he daintily picked out of its bed with the slender tapping finger, and conveyed the luscious morsel to his mouth." This unfortunate little beast was in due time sacrificed to science, being killed by chloroform and sent over to this country in spirit. Its skin may now be seen in the British Museum.

The older writers considered the Aye-Aye to be lazy and slothful, but this is by no means its character, as though, like the well-known dormouse, it spends its days in its nest, curled up comfortably in a ball, and covered with its bushy tail—during which time, no doubt, as Sonnerat remarked, it requires a good deal of shaking to make it move—still after dusk it awakes, and is sufficiently lively and active during the night. Its method of taking its food is, as indeed is not surprising in such an extraordinary animal, most curious. In this performance the long fingers are brought into use, being dipped into the food and drawn rapidly between the lips, thus conveying it into the mouth—an action which has been compared to that of a Chinaman using his chopsticks. It also occasionally laps like a cat. The specimen at the Zoo is fed principally on sopped bread, bananas, and dates; fare on which it appears to thrive. It is by no means an easy animal to keep in confinement, as, like most of the lemurs, it is very susceptible to cold; and it therefore says much for the care and attention that has been bestowed on it by its keeper that it has lived in the Regent's Park for more than two years, and is still in the enjoyment of excellent health.

RECENT CONCERTS.

M. EDOUARD LALO, whose "Rhapsodie Norvégienne" was produced for the first time in England at the Crystal Palace Concert last Saturday, is a composer to whom success has come very late in life. Born so far back as 1823, he has been for the greater part of his life haunted by ill-luck in a manner which would have crushed a man of less originality and power. It is only since the success of his Roi d'Ys, at the Opéra-Comique last year, that his name has become generally known, and it is probably to this that musicians are indebted to Mr. Manns for a performance of the "Rhapsodie Norvégienne," a work which was produced some ten years ago, and has since then gone the round of both France and Germany. Under the circumstances it might have been thought that the work was worthy of a better place in the programme. It was no very great compliment to M. Lalo to place his "Rhapsodie" at the very end of a long concert, when both orchestra and audience must have been tired, nor did the composition itself deserve such treatment. It consists of two movements, an Allegretto in A major and a Presto in D minor, neither of which is very distinctively Norwegian in character, though one of the principal themes of the Presto is, either intentionally or by some strange coincidence, identical with the subject of a familiar pianoforte piece by Grieg. The charm of the work consists more in its admirable orchestration and in the wealth of material from which it is constructed than in any national character in the music. M. Lalo, as was pointed out in the analytical programme, is always lavish to a fault in his thematic matter; but it cannot be said that this is from any lack of constructive power; for, slight though the "Rhapsodie" necessarily is, it betrays the hand of a master in the delicate manner with which the many themes used in it are varied and interwoven into a singularly charming and brilliant whole. It is to be hoped that the work may be repeated soon under more favourable circumstances, for it is an excellent specimen of the best work of the modern French school. The remainder of Saturday's Concert was more than usually interesting. Mme. Anna Mehlig, a pupil of Lebert and Liszt, who has not been heard in public for some time, made a welcome reappearance. Her performance of Beethoven's Fifth Concerto, though somewhat cold, was extremely good. For her other solos she chose Schubert's hackneyed Impromptu in A flat, a work which is not often heard out of the schoolroom, and Liszt's Transcription of Paganini's Rondo "La Campanella." The Symphony was Goetz's beautiful Op. 9, a work which can never be heard without feelings of regret that a man who could write such lovely music should have died so young and have left so little behind him. The programme also included the Overture to Berlioz's Benvenuto Cellini, and Mme. Nordica sang a scena from Marschner's masterpiece, Hans Heiling, and a ballad from Gomez's Guarany. The former, though belonging to an antiquated school, was not deficient in interest; the latter was unworthy both of the singer and the concert. For to-day's concert a revival of Mendelssohn's St. Paul is announced.

The Popular Concert last Monday calls for very brief mention. The first and most interesting number in the programme was Dvořák's fine Quintet for Pianoforte and Strings, a work which was fully discussed when first performed at these concerts last November. A re-hearing confirms the impression that, though unequal in parts, it is one of the Bohemian master's most valuable additions to the repertory of this class of music. The performance by Sir Charles and Lady Hallé, MM. Ries, Strauss, and Piatti, was a singularly fine one. The rest of the programme consisted of such familiar works as Beethoven's Variations on an original air for Pianoforte Solo, Op. 36; Brahms's Sonata, Op. 100, and three numbers from Heller and Ernst's "Pensées Fugitives," for Pianoforte and Violin. The vocalist was Miss Marguerite Hall, who sang Grieg's "Farewell to the Mountains," and Mr. A. Goring Thomas's delightful "Midi au Village" and "Ma Voisine," for the latter of which she received an encore, to which she responded by singing a Norwegian national song.

Miss Mathilde Wurm, a young pianist who comes of a musical family, gave an evening concert last Tuesday at Prince's Hall, which was very well attended. Miss Wurm has made decided improvement since she was heard last season. She plays with accuracy and considerable refinement, and is altogether a performer of much promise. Her powers at present are evidently immature, and it would not be right to criticize her playing from the highest standard. Such qualities as individuality and distinction may develop later; but, as it is, her performances are artistic, and show that she is conscientious and anxious to attain a high degree of perfection. She was heard to advantage in Schumann's "Papillons," Beethoven's "Thirty-two Variations on an Original Air," and in smaller pieces by Grieg, Mendelssohn, and Rubinstein, besides taking part with Herr Holländer in Brahms's Violin and Pianoforte Sonata in A, and an arrangement for two pianos of Saint-Saëns's "Danse Macabre," in which she was joined by her sister, Miss Alice Wurm. A pleasant feature in the concert was the charming singing of Miss Lehmann, who was much applauded in songs by James Hook, F. Thomé, Emmerich, and Eugène d'Albert.

At the second concert of the Royal Choral Society, which took place at the Albert Hall last Wednesday evening, the two most successful of the novelties produced at the Leeds Festival last month were performed for the first time in London. Professor Stanford's Voyage of Maeldune and Dr. Hubert Parry's Ode on St. Cecilia's Day have both been so recently discussed in these columns that detailed notice of either work would be superfluous. It must be sufficient to record that the verdict of Leeds was in every respect ratified by the large and representative audience which was gathered in the Albert Hall on Wednesday. Professor Stanford's work, depending as it does so much upon its admirable orchestration, naturally suffered most from the vast space of the concert-room; but, even allowing for this, the beautiful quartet descriptive of the "Undersea Isle," the charming scene of the witches, and the whole concluding portion of the cantata, produced a profound effect. The parts which at Leeds were sung by Mme. Albani and Miss Hilda Wilson were on this occasion allotted to Miss MacIntyre and Mme. Belle Cole, while the bass music was sung by Mr. Brereton instead of Mr. Barrington Foote. The two former in nowise lost by the change; but Mr. Brereton has neither the voice nor the style suited to Professor Stanford's eminently poetical music. The deficiencies of his method were even more felt in Dr. Parry's Ode, in which the contrast of his singing to Miss MacIntyre's admirable performance was very marked. The chorus, though hardly so good as at Leeds, was, on the whole, satisfactory, though in several places it was evident that more rehearsals would have been advisable. The orchestra left little to be desired; but the curious acoustic defects of the Hall were noticeable in the lack of brilliancy produced by the strings and the undue prominence of the brass instruments. Each composer conducted his work in person, and at the conclusion both were recalled to the platform with much enthusiasm.

MONEY MATTERS.

THE money market has been passing this week through one of its recurring fits of uneasiness. The reserve of the Bank of England is entirely inadequate, and a demand for gold for Berlin likely to reduce that reserve has sprung up. As yet the amount withdrawn from the Bank is trifling—only 9,000*l.*—but it is expected to be much larger by-and-by, and all the metal offering in the open market is also being bought. In Berlin the market is scarce and dear, in consequence of reckless speculation and greatly improved trade. At the same time the New York exchange upon London is so low, that a little further fall would make it profitable to send gold from this country to New York, and in New York rates of interest and discount have been exceedingly high for two months and more. Therefore, it is thought probable that gold will have to go to New York likewise. Then there have been rumours that large amounts will be taken for South America, and, of course, some will have to be sent to Portugal, South Africa, and other countries. Apprehension, however, has been somewhat allayed by the announcement that Messrs. Rothschild are bringing half a million sterling from St. Petersburg. It is said that any further amount required can be obtained there, though, of course, at a higher price, and it is reported that the Bank of France is willing to part with a considerable amount of the metal, if it be necessary to do so, to prevent a disturbance of the London market. The best opinion now is, that whatever gold is sent to Buenos Ayres and Rio de Janeiro will be obtained in Paris.

The price of silver, which at one time was nearly 44*d.* per oz., has fallen to a little under 43*d.* per oz. The active buying of last week has suddenly ceased; and, as there is no Indian demand, the market has given way. The supply of the metal, however, is small; and, if the Mint goes on purchasing largely, there will be a recovery; while, if the foreign buying, which has been on so considerable a scale of late, is resumed, there may be a very marked rise.

The coming Liquidation on the Berlin Bourse is exciting a good deal of apprehension. As was pointed out in this journal some weeks ago, there is reckless speculation in Germany in the shares of industrial Companies of all kinds, and that was preceded by a wild speculation in International Bonds. The speculators have for some months past been paying very high rates for the loans that enable them to carry on their operations. At the end of September, however, several of them found it difficult to renew their loans, and at the end of last month the difficulty was greater still. It is feared that at the coming Liquidation it will be impossible to obtain all the money that will be required, and that in consequence there will be a crisis on the Bourse. It is possible, however, that a breakdown may be averted, for the great financial houses all over Europe are interested in preventing a crisis in Berlin. Were one to occur, the speculators would be compelled to sell international securities on a very large scale, and would thus depress prices on every Bourse and Stock Exchange in Europe. But a fall in prices would render impossible the Government loans and Company issues which are being prepared in such large numbers. It is probable, therefore, that the great financial houses all over Europe will give to the German banks whatever assistance may be necessary to prevent a crisis just now, unless, indeed, they find that the speculation has been carried so far that it is better to stop it at any cost than to risk worse consequences by prolonging it.

In spite of money market uneasiness and the apprehended crisis on the Berlin Bourse, there has been a decided increase of speculative business on the London Stock Exchange this week. The most marked increase in activity is in the American market. Many shares and bonds have risen very considerably. It would seem that the stringency in the New York money market has so far come to an end that operators there have taken courage, and are acting with more energy than heretofore. It is quite true, no doubt, that the Associated Banks in New York do not hold as much reserve as they are required to do by law; but apparently it is expected that gold in considerable amounts will be taken from Europe to New York, and will so relieve the money market that speculators may act more freely than for some time past. Trade is very active in the United States, and the traffic returns of the railways show large increases. And therefore, if a tolerably easy money market can be counted upon, a recovery in prices generally is reasonably to be looked for. There has also been an advance in the stocks of several British railway Companies, and altogether the feeling is more sanguine than it has been for some time past. Speculators, however, will do well to recollect that a large export of gold would immediately alarm the money market, and might upset all calculations on the Stock Exchange.

French capitalists have for some time past been buying Brazilian securities in London on a very extensive scale. It will be recollected that a group of French bankers obtained valuable privileges from the Brazilian Government lately, and founded the National Bank of Brazil. Evidently it is the hope of these bankers and their followers to "exploit" Brazil, and they are buying up bonds and shares very eagerly.

There is much dissatisfaction amongst applicants for the shares of the Exploration Company, Limited, on account of the long time taken in making allotments. Exactly three weeks elapsed between the day when subscriptions were received and the day when letters of regret and allotment were sent out. During these three weeks the money deposited by applicants has been lying at the banks entirely out of the control of its owners. In the end many of them received back cheques in full with letters of regret, and even those to whom shares have been allotted have generally got only from 2 to 4 per cent. of the amount applied for.

The price of Scotch pig iron rose on Tuesday to 64s. 2d. per ton, the highest price touched since 1880. There has been a slight decline since Tuesday, but doubtless there will be an early recovery, and a further advance. Usually the price of Cleveland iron is about four or five shillings a ton lower than Scotch. This week it has been more than three shillings a ton higher, the explanation being that the stocks of iron in the North of England are decreasing exceedingly rapidly. Of course speculation is running up prices unduly, and it is to be feared will injure the trade, by checking consumption on the one hand, and encouraging workpeople's demands for increased wages beyond what the condition of the trade justifies. But as yet speculation has not been carried too far, and the state of the industry warrants a great part of the rise that has taken place.

BARNUM'S SHOW.

IT is clear that to the American mind "greatest" and "largest" convey precisely the same meaning, otherwise that honest and modest citizen Mr. P. T. Barnum would no doubt have hesitated before he adopted the grandiloquent title for his wonderful show of good, bad, and indifferent materials now being exhibited at Olympia. The characteristic want of artistic restraint in the presentment of the performance may be imagined from the fact that the managers exhibited what may be described as three circuses and two variety shows simultaneously to a bewildered audience of 18,000 spectators. It is true that Olympia is very ill adapted for performances of all kinds. For some mysterious reason the designer adopted an elliptical instead of a semi-circular form for the building, with the result that one-half of the audience must be alternately entertained at the expense of the other half. In order to meet this difficulty, Mr. Barnum and his managers have filled the available space with three Rings or "Arenas" and two stages. A circus performance is carried on in each ring and a music-hall performance on each stage. This sounds like a very fine, as it is a very liberal, arrangement; but practically the performances interfere with each other. The seats are packed so close together that it is impossible for a spectator, seated halfway between an arena and a stage, to turn his back, say on some riding in an arena, in order to enjoy the antics of a very engaging bear on a stage.

To turn to the consideration of the various items in a very long programme, the first "Display" to excite any lively interest or attention was the exhibition by two ladies and three gentlemen of a probably unrivalled performance of a number of elephants, both large and small, who were put through a series of tricks and evolutions, without a hitch of any kind. Mr. John O'Brien, who rode one horse and drove four others at racing speed over a number of hurdles, is perhaps the very best rider who has appeared in a circus show within living memory. His performance alone is worth more than one visit to Olympia. The quality of the horsemanship was, on the whole, remarkably good. The racing, in the second part of the programme, was pretty enough, notably the trotting-race and that between ponies with monkey-jockeys. A special word should also be said for the various trapeze performers engaged. The two American Cowboys were clever; but the interest in them was discounted by familiarity. Visitors to the Show may be recommended to avoid some portion of the performance, and reserve themselves for the new and original historical spectacle, "Nero," which concludes the performance. It is not too much to say that Mr. Imre Kiralfy has equalled the most successful efforts of Mr. Augustus Harris in this line.

The menagerie is well worth a visit, and those who are not too sensitive in such matters will be amused with the monstrosities. Of these the Aztecs—the very last representatives of their race—are the most interesting, while "the skeleton dude" gives a national flavour to the whole. Finally, the management of the Show cannot be praised too highly, if we except the overcrowding of which we have already spoken.

"O SAY NOT SO!"

["My utterances have of late been multiplied beyond what is desirable."—MR. GLADSTONE.]

O SAY not so! Recall that word,
Conceived amiss and launched in haste,
In it your mood alone is heard—
Your mood, and not the public taste.

Desirable? 'Twere little good
That word's strict import to inquire;
Men's use and wont, men's daily food,
That grows to be what men desire.

The wind that o'er the mountain blows
For lullaby the shepherd takes;
Waves sing the seaman to repose,
When stops the mill the miller wakes.

And know that to our senses bears
That well-known voice you fain would save
The same relation as to theirs
The wind, the mill-wheel, and the wave.

Know that the post-cards that you pen,
The words you scatter by the way,
Are felt by all your countrymen
As part and parcel of their day.

Should you those "utterances" withhold
Wherewith you vainly think them cloyed,
Their breakfast-tables would be cold,
Their morning papers would be void.

The citizen would hie him thence To plunge into the city's strife,
Disturbed and restless with a sense
Of something wanting in his life.

We do not ask what views you hold,
We need not know, we do not care;
All, all we need is to unfold
Our daily sheet and find you there.

You have become a habit—such
That we, its slaves, have ceased at last
To put it to our reason's touch,
But only feel it binds us fast.

Ah! break it not, we pray you—don't!
Respect our deep dislike to range,
Unmoored from this one rock of Wont,
The pathless, shoreless sea of Change.

Nay, more than this—a debt you owe
To our conceptions of the fit;
Gladst-ne to wed with Silence? No!
Fancy declines to picture it!

And when you tell us that your mind
A union so unnatural plans,
The common conscience of mankind
Arises and forbids the banns.

EMPRESSES and Queens are generally born in the purple and brought up to the duties of a position which is more often ornamental than useful. But we confess we are inclined to compassionate a lady who is suddenly elevated to a brief tenure of the dignity of Vicequeen of Hindustan. We should fancy that she often finds support and consolation in the thought that she has only a five-years' lease of the oppressive grandeur. Not that Lady Dufferin writes these journals in doleful strain; on the contrary, they are full of life and sprightliness. Whether in residence or travelling through her Empire on State progresses, she made the best of the exceptional advantages of her position, and set herself thoroughly to enjoy the sights and scenes she saw under singularly favourable circumstances. We do not even pity her for anything we can read between the lines, for she never makes any serious complaints, although she sometimes expresses natural weariness, or indulges in a grumble at the deluges descending on the hills in the monsoons. Her actual responsibilities were not onerous, and, though she busied herself in initiating and encouraging many philanthropic undertakings, she says that her life seemed sometimes an idle one. So it may have been, compared to the incessant and involuntary activity of her husband. But these sparkling though simple extracts from the diaries show the manner and the strain of her daily existence. It was living from early morning to night in an antiquated Court-dress of rustling brocade, with stiff golden embroideries. In the country of etiquette and ceremony par excellence she was perpetually surrounded by state and pomp; and even at the hill stations she breathed an atmosphere of formality almost as trying as the sultry temperature of Calcutta, which the punkahs scarcely alleviated. As consort of the Viceroy, she was always doing the honours at durbars or grand banquets to potentates morbidly jealous on those points of etiquette which govern and complicate their inter-provincial relations. They paid back their vice-suzerain's sumptuous hospitality in kind, and their interminable entertainments must often have been intolerable bores, though Nautch-girls or wild Bheels were brought in to dance at dessert, and the dinner came to a close in a blaze of fireworks. And beyond the ceremony, which was the burden of her place, she suffered other things in common with humbler individuals. She had to resign herself to regulating her habits by the sun, to turning out for morning Church service before early breakfast, and then to sequestering herself from the sun-glare in darkened rooms till it was safe to venture out for the evening drive. It was possible to exclude the obtrusive light, but privacy was almost impossible of attainment. Too zealous servants, eager to deserve their rice and salt, were ever on duty outside ill-fitting doors. On her first arrival at Calcutta her personal Jemadar kept pricking his ears to catch the sound of any movement, which he answered as promptly as if she had been striking a hand-bell. She says that at last she was afraid to shift a chair from its place lest her watchful guardian spirit should make a plunge into the apartment.

That is the darker side of the picture, and it must forcibly strike anybody of mature experiences who has become alive to the vanity of mortal ambitions. But we are bound to say, on the whole, that, assuming a Vicequeen to be healthy and light-hearted like Lady Dufferin, the sweets predominated over the bitters. If she lived and breathed in formal state, she was moving continually before a bright succession of dissolving views, full of impressive contrasts and rich in picturesque suggestion. She was struck at first by the strange contrast in the motley crowds which had gathered to see Lord Dufferin's arrival at Bombay. The city of palaces and palatial warehouses had decked itself in its most brilliant colours; gay groups in strange and gorgeous costumes jostled each other in the streets, or shone from the balconies and from beneath the broad verandahs. But from the Bombay that was built in the cotton boom, under the consulship of Sir Bartle Frere, the procession passed into the overcrowded and squalid native quarter which has scarcely changed since the Presidency was a province of the Moguls. "Almost every individual was a study in himself"; there were "natives of every shape and colour . . . children clothed with nothing at all, and parents with the nearest approach to nothing that I ever saw before." We do not, of course, profess to give chronological sketches of the contents of the journals. We can merely dip here and there, to take something that strikes us as characteristic or suggestive; and we may remark that, as the Viceregal party in its annual arrangements revolved pretty much over the same ground, the first of the two volumes is decidedly the fresher and more interesting. Though these annual revolutions were occasionally varied by a more formidable expedition to the remoter confines of the British dominions, as when the Viceroy visited the recent acquisitions in Burmah, or when he penetrated from sterile Scinde through Beloochistan to the passes leading into the highlands of Afghanistan, associated with British victories and disasters.

In the second year of the Viceroyalty Lord Dufferin received the Afghan Amir at Rawul Pindi. For many reasons it was the most impressive of the many pageants which Lady Dufferin witnessed. The chiefs of the Punjab had gathered in to do honour to the great occasion. They strove to outshine each other in personal display. As they were presented one after another to the Viceroy, Lady Dufferin had "time to admire their clothes and their splendid jewelry. One had a great crown on, something like a bishop's mitre; but, magnificent though it looked, it is by no means his best one." "The mayor and aldermen" of Rawul Pindi came attired in their flowing Oriental draperies. The semi-independent Rajahs appeared in due order of precedence. The long black locks of the Prince of Bahawalpur were surmounted by a splendid diamond tiara, seven inches high, over the forehead. Some of them drove in silver carriages; others were surrounded by gentlemen of their suites, who turned themselves into musicians for the occasion and sounded the "tom-toms" as they rode along. As for the great man who was the hero of the fêtes, his semi-barbarous escort, though picturesque enough, scarcely showed to advantage. His troopers, who "were splendid specimens of the genus ragamuffin," were mounted on small, lean horses, with their little rats' tails tied in knots. The men were resplendent in gaudy orange tunics, and wore heavy sheepskin headdresses, like the bearskins of our own Guards. Their master came to the meeting in a very amiable humour, and was so pleased with all he saw of our countrymen that he was inclined to prolong his trip to England. He showed his hosts the æsthetic and more genial side of his character; amused himself with arranging cut flowers in a variety of vases, and expressed a wish for a regular and ample supply. "This is the man," moralizes Lady Dufferin, "who cuts off heads and hangs people when at home, and who is accompanied here by his executioner, who, dressed in red velvet and wearing his axe and strangling rope, helps at other times to put up the tents." Talking of putting up the tents, Lady Dufferin found life under canvas at Rawul Pindi far from agreeable. The rain came down without ceasing; the ladies had to rush along the soaking passages for fear of getting "a cold drop down one's back," the great flat-roofed pavilion intended for holding the grand durbar was drenched, so that it became necessary to postpone the ceremony; and in the withdrawing pavilion, to which the party adjourned after dinner, they sat in bitter draughts and the drip of a shower-bath, so that the ladies had to send for woollen shawls by way of wraps.

Sipi Fair, held in the depths of a sheltered valley among the hills near Simla, was equally characteristic in a different way. Though dying out, it still lingers on, a survival and illustration of the older Indian customs. There were merry-go-rounds, and wild-beast shows, and monstrosities, and stalls—in short, all the attractions of these merry-makings all the world over. But the special purpose of the Sipi Fair is supposed to be matrimony, and "in a sort of amphitheatre on the hill-side sit the candidates for hymeneal honours. . . . There were rows and rows of women and girls dressed in their very best, and bright-coloured jackets and scarves and nether garments adorned them, while their heads, noses, ears, throats, arms, and ankles were all heavily laden with jewelry." We do not know that there was much romance in the matter at any time. It must always have been pretty much a case of bargain and sale. But now it seems that the feminine ware is made to serve the baser purposes of imposture; at least, Lady Dufferin suspects that much of the jewelry is displayed for the occasion, as it is shown in other countries in booths or in shop windows, to invite tenders from English visitors and curio-hunters. Lady Dufferin has a pretty taste in scenery, and a happy gift of describing it vividly. What seems to have pleased her most in all India was "the ideal beauty" of the Lake at Udaipur—which we presume is the new and fashionable spelling of our old acquaintance Oudeypore—indeed, she is inclined to pronounce the lake a beautiful Bosphorus. In striking contrast to lake scenery like that of Oudeypore, or such wooded and well-watered paradises as that of the Dehra Doon, enclosed in the double embrace of Jumna and Ganges, were the arid wastes and rolling rock-country which was traversed on the journey from Kurrachee to Quetta. And the journal paints in the brightest colours the picturesque progress up the stream of the Irrawaddy to the capital we summarily transferred from Theebaw, who, from all Lady Dufferin tells us, well deserved his fate. But if Theebaw had any susceptibility in his soul, like Boabdil sighing over the last view of Granada, he must have lamented the land he had lost and the people he had misgoverned beyond endurance. Nothing could be gayer or more enchanting than the broad flood of the great Burmese river, with the covered and gilded state barges, with the fleets of quaintly designed and painted small craft, with the groups of sightseers gathered under the shade of the palm-groves, and chiefly with the cities which, though they may really be as so many whited sepulchres, are adorned with marble palaces of fanciful architecture, and with the countless fantastic pagodas that cover their innumerable shrines. Altogether there is infinite variety in the contents of the volumes; we are hurried forward from one scene of interest to another; and, had space admitted, we should have had something to say about the Viceroy's chequered fortunes in the hunting-field when he tried the chances of sport on a rare holiday.

ENGLISH detective novels cannot usually be looked on in the light of "happy thoughts." In the first place, the authors have not the peculiar talent or patience that is necessary in order to work out the story backwards, so that every link in the chain may be well proportioned and complete, and, in the second, the Anglo-Saxon race is too blundering to turn out good detectives. Dogged persistence does characterize it, but not the flair so essential to the successful discovery of crime. The Black Box Murder is, however, more readable than its fellows, though it teems with faults and absurdities. The first and crowning act of impossibility ascribed to any of the characters is the stoical demeanour of the heroine, Miss Simpkinson, at the Paris railway station, when the Custom-House officials, on examining her black box, disclosed the dead body of an elderly lady, instead of the photographic apparatus which Miss Simpkinson expected to find there. And, if this unpleasant spectacle were not enough to startle the most well-balanced nerves, Miss Simpkinson at once recognized the corpse to be that of a friend whom she had left behind her two days before at Southend. Yet, like the widow of the "warrior," she "nor swooned nor uttered cry," but instantly made up her mind as to the murderer and the line of conduct she would herself take in her official examination. This was being "mistress of herself, though china fall" with a vengeance! And the real culprit is a match for her in self-control. It may be reasonably doubted whether the supposed teller of the tale, a member of a private inquiry office in London, would be allowed by the French police to meddle quite so much in their affairs, and whether they would not have scented out the pencilled "P.H." on the black-box label much sooner than any Englishman that ever was born; but, perhaps, the sagacity of the Rue de Jérusalem has deteriorated since the days of M. Lecoq. A second weakness in the tale is the treatment of these initials, which play a prominent part, and are continually being referred to. If the reader will compare the facsimile on p. 49 with that on 211, he will see that, though the reproduction is supposed to be exact, the letters are really entirely dissimilar, and that the P. in both is absolutely unlike the P. on p. 95. The letters should have been printed from the same block to secure perfect similarity. Besides this, no detective that knew his business would ever have been deceived by the tumbled bed that "looked as if it had been slept in." As a great French writer long ago remarked, the only way to make a bed look as if it had been slept in is to sleep in it; but this elementary axiom of murder as one of the fine arts is unknown to the gifted murderer. In spite of his aplomb, presence of mind, and general foresight, this superior person had his limitations. It entirely failed to strike him that a clergyman of the Church of England might as well acknowledge himself a murderer at once as prove an alibi by confessing that he had passed his night—where he did pass it. But the best of us are apt to err, and the clergyman was too new to his work to be quite perfect in his trade. Lastly, the first duty of a detective is surely to hold his tongue, and to resist the temptation of "scoring off" his opponents before the proper time; but our author repeatedly imperils his chances of success, and indeed his own life, by his folly in this respect. Yet, as we have said, the book is interesting and readable enough, and will carry the traveller lightly over the weary miles between London and Peterborough.

Those of us who are acquainted with Mr. Edgar Fawcett's novels are aware that the glories of his language will not always stand examination. Here, for instance, on the very first page of Divided Lives is a sentence that will stir the heart's blood of all sentient beings, and will cause the pulses of the coldest to thrill:—"The spring sky had got a translucent daffodil colour, as though the sunken sun had dropped into some awful cauldron of ruin." And, again, "that day had been the wedding-day of the woman whose smile had once fed his being, whose glance had possessed the power to dizzy him with a delicious vertigo, whose touch had held for him the electric energy no wisdom can explain, and no rhapsody can fitly portray." Instead of being grateful to any circumstance which had deprived him of the sensation of vertigo—so little prized by those that go down to the sea in ships or journey along the land in railways—Mr. Hubert Throckmorton is brokenhearted at the loss of Miss Angela Laight, "married that afternoon to a man toward whom her matrimonial motive must have been sordid in the extreme." It was nothing of the sort. She merely broke off her engagement to Hubert Throckmorton and declined to see him again because a mutual friend pointed out a child and its mother as Throckmorton's illegitimate property. Like all heroines of novels, the trust she puts in people is in an inverse ratio to the closeness of her relations with them. She believes in Hubert's guilt, and promptly marries the real culprit in the matter, who bears the astonishing name of Bleakly Voght. Then follows a time graphically described by Mr. Fawcett as one of "grievous worritment," to Angela, and of fruitful literary effort to Hubert, who produces a poem, "the bulk of a novel," entitled Glenalvan. This gives Mr. Fawcett a chance to interpolate some unfavourable remarks upon English poets, which he is not slow to take. English Bards and Scotch Reviewers is "an over-estimated literary snarl"; Mr. Swinburne has become "monotonous" with his "fatal recent decadence"; Mr. Browning is a "pietist genius and poseur combined, a brilliant yet insolently lazy poet." The glory of these effete writers was but as "the immense pallor of a moonlit sea" to that of Glenalvan, but in spite of this fact it fell flat at first; and required the assistance of a review in an influential paper before its power could be "fleetly realized" by the public. If Mr. Throckmorton could only have been content with the triumphs of his pen, he would have spared himself a good deal of worritment, but unluckily one day he pined for field sports. Mr. Bleakly Voght pined for them, too, at the same time and in the same place; the two met and exchanged hard words. Mr. Throckmorton's gun struck the branch of a tree and went off (so he said), Mr. Voght fell, and, not unnaturally recognizing some relation between cause and effect, denounced Throckmorton as his murderer. Another period of "grievous worritment" ensues, at the end of which the murderer is discovered to be Voght's servant, the brother of the betrayed girl, who had gone out intending to shoot his master, and had fired at precisely the same instant that Throckmorton's gun had gone off. Verily fiction is stranger than truth! So there being neither legal nor moral impediment further to sunder these Divided Lives, they agreed to unite, and to hold each other dearer for "destiny's trying delays." Such is the epitome of Mr. Fawcett's book. "It may be dull, but I'm not complaining," and at all events the elegant vocabulary of the reader is sensibly enlarged by its perusal.

Barbara Allan opens the gate to a very prosy and commonplace world in comparison with the realms of magnificence we have lately been studying. From no point of view can the story be said to be very exciting, yet it is cleverly and carefully told, and bears abundant evidence of good workmanship. Pious-tongued and defrauding elders are not so common in fiction as they once were, and the portrait of the decadence of Provost Allan, which begins with the inner man and ends with the outer, is sober and well drawn. That of Baillie Whittet, his friend, and the candidate for Barbara's hand, is not quite so consistent. It is to be doubted if a man who had led a narrow and sordid (and not very honest) life till he was fifty would suddenly become all that was high-minded and chivalrous through falling in love with a young girl. The traditions of men's habits bind them down in spite of their wishes, and few can succeed in freeing themselves as completely from the burden of their sins as did Baillie Whittet. Barbara and her two old aunts are pleasant and natural, but without anything very distinctive about them. Still, Miss Cleland knows what she is writing about, and can lend a certain interest to the homely scenes she describes by virtue of her plain and straightforward manner of telling about them.

Nothing more innocent and ignorant ever was written than A Happy Wooing, by Miss Cliffe Halliday. It is quite beautiful to see her faith in the young aristocrat with the dark blue eyes who is all powerful in every relation of life, who by a careless word had "changed a plain woman into a professional beauty, had given a name and a banking account to an obscure and mediocre actress" (a distinctly unjustifiable act, by the way), "had made the fortune of a novel, had saved a tottering play." The professional beauty, the actress, and the play have to be taken on trust; but ample evidence is given us about the novel. The all-powerful young man, Mr. Silver, had a friend, one Adam Ash, who wrote a novel. Like other novels, before and since, it was rejected by the publisher; and Adam was in such despair he put a revolver to his head. In this critical situation he was discovered (through the keyhole) by two friends of Mr. Silver's—the Miss Moneys, heiresses, from the South Pacific. They force an entrance, confiscate the revolver, and call surreptitiously on the publishers on the way home to arrange the financial part of the matter and to dictate a letter, by which the publishers, in the most artless manner, inform Mr. Ash that their clerk had made a mistake, and not only would they give him 200*l.* for his book, but would publish it at once. On top of this Mr. Silver "gave out his intention of calling on Messrs. Sawyer & Sharp. They would listen to his opinion with something more than respect, and he would tell them what he thought of The Fatal Secret and its gifted author; and the book should be puffed and advertised in every quarter as no three-volume novel in the United Kingdom had ever been puffed and advertised before" (vol. i. p. 138). And he was as good as his word. Before The Fatal Secret even appeared "the word had gone forth to 'write up' the book; and so its publishers cheerfully set to work to advertise its appearance, regardless of expense" (vol. i. p. 290). This, no doubt, is a faithful account of the way in which the outside world regards literary transactions. Nothing is ever accepted on its own merit; no publisher's reader ever has sufficient instinct or gains sufficient experience to know bad from good; still less does such a thing exist as honest and disinterested criticism. Yet the work referred to is supposed to be what the detestable slang of the day would describe as "an epoch-making" work. The social part of A Happy Wooing is equal to the description of literary matters in the felicity with which the author lays down the law on subjects of which she knows little. The two Miss Moneys are an aunt and a niece fabulously rich and young enough to be very attractive. Indeed the aunt, a model of grace and refinement, is habitually spoken of by a young man of the aristocracy as "toppin' fun"; while she increases his already high opinion of her by one day inquiring if he is not a "Jubilee Juggins." There is a good deal of this delicate wit scattered about, as well as some rapturous descriptions of ladies' dresses. The meanest intelligence guesses, on the first page, that the elder Miss Money is not the younger's aunt, but her sister, and she has assumed this disguise in order to dispense with a chaperon. The division of the South Pacific wealth is a little puzzling; for when, on the same day, the two Miss Moneys refuse the two young men who think them "toppin' fun," one sister says to her suitor, "It is Jane who is the heiress"; while the other remarks, "It all belongs to Minnie." However, on the day that both are united to the men of their hearts—Mr. Ash and his advertising medium, Mr. Silver—the mystery is cleared up by their black man of business from the South Pacific. It is announced by him that Mr. Money, late guano exporter, had a holy horror of interested marriages; so this artless person resolved to prevent the possibility of his daughters falling a prey to fortune-hunters by making three wills—one genuine, to be left in the island, dividing the money, and two sham ones, which he gave to each of his daughters, bequeathing in each the money to the other, so that she might "forget the real will," and, with a clear conscience, declare to all and sundry that she was a pauper. Was ever such a farrago of nonsense strung together? The book has nothing to be said for it except that it is harmless; but it is dull and unreal, and generally vulgar.

CLASSICAL SCHOOL-BOOKS, MOSTLY AMERICAN.*

MR. COLLAR'S book is excellent in design, though scarcely so original as he appears to think. It contains some fifty pages of Latin text, consisting of a condensed account of the seven kings of Rome, and of selections from Nepos, Cæsar, and Cicero. These selections are divided into paragraphs of convenient length, and to each section there are two sets of English-Latin exercises based on the text, one consisting of short sentences for reading in class, the other being a reproduction, with varied constructions, of the subject-matter of the original passage. The latter is, of course, to be turned into Latin prose. It is clear that Mr. Collar has given much thought and labour to working out his idea, and the result is a very satisfactory book. The exercises are carefully graduated in difficulty, and the greatest possible amount of practice in Latin composition is got out of each passage. It is to be regretted that Mr. Collar did not abstain from the practice, which is becoming too common among compilers of school-books, of writing a preface on the general principles of teaching the subject with which the book deals. He quotes a familiar passage from Ascham on the benefits of retranslation, and then proceeds to assume that "for three hundred years we have neglected the wise words of the old schoolmaster," and so forth; in fact, that from the death of Ascham until the coming of Mr. Collar teachers of Latin have misunderstood their trade. We can assure Mr. Collar that in England, at any rate, teachers of the better sort have been fully alive to the value of retranslation, and we could show him half a dozen Latin school-books whose purpose is to teach Latin writing by a method akin to his own. But no one can resent his artless pride in his discovery, or rediscovery. He writes in no arrogant tone—rather in naïve unconsciousness that he is advancing any extraordinary claims to consideration. It is a pity that he could not puff his own wares without depreciating a work which he does not name, but which is evidently T. K. Arnold's Introduction to Latin Prose Composition. For years this book has been one of the most valuable guides to sound scholarship, and it is likely to remain so when Mr. Collar's work, good as it is, is furnishing wrappers for its inevitable successor.

Mr. Hogue's work on Attic irregular verbs lays no claim to originality, but it should be useful as a school-book. It gives tolerably full information on points of accident, meaning, and syntax, and also the chief derivatives, both Greek and English, of each verb. Some very odd words are included among the English derivatives, the most absurd being "sozodont," which he gravely puts down under σῶζω. Why not also include the advertising hairdresser's "caloplokamous fluid," and that grim word "ecoscevephoron," which one now and then sees painted on a furniture van? A certain amount of casual information is given parenthetically; for instance, under μάχη we find νίκη and νικάω, ἡττά and ἡττάομαι. If students are to work steadily through the book, and not merely use it as a book of reference, such information may help them to acquire a vocabulary, but in that case it should be given more systematically. It is a little odd that the compiler of a book of this kind should not have seen Mr. Rutherford's New Phrynichus—which appeared, we fancy, at least eight years ago—until he had almost finished his task. A writer on Attic forms can hardly be called fully equipped without some knowledge of that work.

Mr. Flagg's edition of Iphigenia in Tauris is a respectable school edition, and no more. The notes explain all that needs explanation, and a good deal that does not, and they contain far too much translation. Taking the Parodos as an example, we find that a tolerably intelligent youth might prepare his lesson with very little use of his lexicon. Not merely words, but passages several lines long which present no sort of difficulty, are translated, and often very nicely translated; but an edition for school use is not the place for these literary essays. A good translation of the text may with advantage be set before boys when they have worked out the meaning for themselves; as an aid to preparation it only encourages idleness. Mr. Flagg's introduction is open to similar criticism. It is about as long as the play itself. It deals with the legend, the plot and construction of the play, the metres, and so forth; but it is overloaded with more or less irrelevant matter, and spoilt as an instrument of teaching by attempts at fine writing. If it were cut down to half its present length it would be very much more useful than it actually is. As the notes are printed at the foot of the page, the accompanying volume, containing the text alone, will be found convenient for use in class.

Mr. Owen's little volume of Ovid, Tristia, III., is an excellent school edition. The notes give all needful help towards interpretation of the text, and those on Roman topography, in III. 1, are excellent. Many editors of classical texts might learn a useful lesson on the necessary difference between school editions and editions for scholars by comparing this work with Mr. Owen's recently published critical edition of the Tristia.

RUSSIA IN CENTRAL ASIA.*

WE have hardly more than one fault to find with Mr. Curzon's book on Central Asia, and it must be confessed that this is no large allowance. The dedication "To the great army of Russophobes who mislead others, and Russophiles whom others mislead, I dedicate this book, which will be found equally disrespectful to the ignoble terrors of the one and the perverse complacency of the others." We happen ourselves to be in a good position for judging this performance, being neither Russophobe nor Russophil, and having for a good many years laboured in the direction on which Mr. Curzon announces his progress. But the form of his proclamation is perhaps a little too suggestive of the clever young man who, having taken "all the prizes at Oxford College, which is the best college in the world" (it was "the other shop" in the original, but no matter), having been provided with the advantages of a seat in Parliament and a pocket full of money to make the grand tour, comes home to set everybody on both sides right. Never was a more erroneous impression given by bush of wine. Mr. Curzon does, indeed, here and there somewhat partake of that infallibility which is the birthright of the youngest, and he has small bursts here and there of very nice writing which dimly suggest (and very pleasant memories, too) the dome of the Radcliffe, and the little desks in the old Divinity School, and the Essays which a man used to send in with ingenious mottos chosen from recondite literature. But there is no harm in this, and on the whole the book is a really excellent specimen of political travel, full of learning and information, without being over-stuffed with either, light and pleasantly written without "travellers' thorn-crackling," patriotic without spread-eagleism, and polite to foreigners without xenomania. It is certainly the best book which has yet appeared in England on the subject; and that by no means merely or even chiefly because it is the latest.

The measureless lying of the Russophiles, whom Mr. Curzon in the dedication kindly lets off as "misled," has appeared nowhere better than in the fact that they have already claimed Mr. Curzon himself as a witness on the Russian side. The excuse for this is that, like sensible people in general and ourselves in particular, he disclaims the notion that a reasonable Englishman dislikes Russians as Russians, or a reasonable Russian dislikes Englishmen as Englishmen; that he admits to the full that Russian rule, however sanguinary in its installation, and however crooked the diplomatic ways which precede it, means the putting down of anarchy and the introduction of civilization; and that he also admits to the full that England has herself to blame for the déboires of the past and the dangers of the future—that her own blindness, shilly-shallying, and reluctance to draw the knightly sword before blowing feeble blasts of irresolute defiance on the horn are far more culpable than the fraud and force of Russia. So says he, and so say all of us who keep our brains. But no Englishman that we know of has, while keeping correct form of speech, expressed himself more unhesitatingly about the conduct of Russia. He condemns Skobelev's blood-bath at Geok Tepe almost more severely than we could do ourselves; for the Cromwellian policy has, no doubt, often answered well in such cases, and particularly in this case. He speaks somewhere of a certain diplomatic engagement as one "which only a Russian diplomatist could bring himself to give, and only an English one could bring himself to believe." And these are his words as to the Stolietoff mission:—

It shattered the pretty theory of the British Russophiles like a house of cards. That a Power at peace with ourselves, in the face of an old standing engagement that Afghanistan should remain outside the sphere of its influence, and with the ink upon a fresh international agreement [the Treaty of Berlin, known by Stolietoff to be signed] scarcely dry, should deliberately instigate to war an ally of our own, and throw the shield of its patronage over a course of the meanest chicane, was more than the most devoted partisan could stomach. So far as I know, the good faith of Russia has never, on either side in politics, found an honest spokesman since.

We can only say, borrowing partly from Colonel Macartney, "Faith, then, there's a many dishonest ones"; and, wishing these dishonest ones joy of Mr. Curzon, we quit that part of the matter.

Mr. Curzon (as people who do not forget newspaper paragraphs and magazine articles may remember) acquired his actual experience of things Central Asian when the Transcaspian Railway was formally opened to Samarcand last year, and when he formed part of a small company of tourists "Cooked" by the Société des Wagons Lits, and sanctioned (not, in Mr. Curzon's case, without immense out-reeling of red tape and great searchings of heart) by the numerous Russian authorities who have to do with the matter. For passports (and those, too, things compared to which the ordinary passport is a mere scrap of paper costing nothing and worth nothing) are very real things in Transcaspia, and many a tourist has been stopped and left to foam at the mouth in his book afterwards for want of them. The line, however, has been repeatedly described by newspaper Correspondents and travellers; and, though Mr. Curzon's remarks on it will be new to many readers, and are agreeable reading for all, they do not contain novel information to those who have studied the matter. On Bokhara, Samarcand, and Tashkent he is, if not absolutely novel, newer. But even where he is actually recounting travel he has an eye to the second part of his title, "The Anglo-Russian Question"; and thereafter he has three long chapters, amounting to fully one-third of his book, on this general question and the bearing of his own observations and those of others upon it.

These views do not greatly differ from those which have often been urged here, and which, with modifications of personal opinion, are held by most people who have been privileged to know the enormous revolution of theory and practice which has taken place of very late years in the highest political and military quarters of India. Where a few years ago there was a welter of wrangling between "forwards" and "backwards," with occasionally a vain effort to get the Home Government to appreciate the situation, there has now for some time past been a plan of operations arranged for almost every contingency, and in no few respects actually carried out. Briefly, then, Mr. Curzon thinks, and has good reason for thinking, that, while a Russian invasion of India would now be a very perilous thing for the Russians, it is deliberately contemplated by them, not so much with any definite hope of actual conquest, as in the light of a means of paralysing England in Europe. He sketches the well-known plans for such an invasion, and comments on the curious delusion about Indian risings which all Russians entertain, and in which they are encouraged by some Frenchmen. Then he goes off into the question what England should do in case of a further Russian advance. His views on the Afghan part of this question are mainly, though by no means wholly, in accordance with the views above referred to, especially as regards the earnestness with which he deprecates a premature acceptance of the Russian plan of actual continuous marches between British and Russian Afghanistan. So, also, when he comes to Persia, he follows good authority in regarding Northern Persia as past praying for (though he considers the possession of Khorassan by Russia as the greatest of dangers, because of the provision of supplies thus afforded), but urging the extension of a corresponding and counterbalancing supremacy for England in Southern Persia, and especially in Seistan and along the Gulf. Here, also, readers of the Saturday Review will be not unprepared for his views. And he will have nothing whatever to hear of expelling Russia from the Khanates or from once-independent Turkestan—in which, indeed, he is right enough, for it is too late. We certainly do not want to go there, even if we could turn Russia out; and that being the case, we could not prevent her from coming back.

Although in some slight respects we may differ with Mr. Curzon (for instance, as to the "blessings of civilization," whether they are illustrated by Geok Tepe or by Ganjam); and while we think that, like some other people, he has not entirely cleared up his mind as to what he would do, say, if he were dictator to-morrow, and Colonel Alikhanoff tried to do Penjdeh over again, we recommend his book very heartily. It is, as becomes the work of a scholar as well as a man of the world, amply furnished with statistics and bibliography, with extracts of treaties and chronological tables. But, what is much more important, it also contains a lucid view of the actual state of affairs, and plenty of sound and sensible argument as to the probable consequences of that state, the duties which it imposes, and so forth. We only hope that it will find more readers than books of the kind usually have. By all means let us wish with Mr. Curzon a future of beneficence, and even of splendour, to the Central Asian dominion of the Czar. We are, we repeat, not aware that any sane Englishman wishes anything else, or has any further petition to make of that august monarch than that he will cease to reward his servants for putting, or trying to put, their hands into our pockets. To all Central Asia, properly so-called, Russia is quite welcome. She is not welcome to Afghanistan, she is not welcome to Persia (even Northern Persia), and we should more decidedly than Mr. Curzon does intimate to her that any further advance southwards will mean war out of hand and immediate. But that is the extent of our Russophobia—a surely harmless desire to keep the honest man out of the closets which are, or which open into, our own. No one, it would seem, can be much more certain than Mr. Curzon himself that the honest man will want a great deal of keeping out, and that we shall have to sleep with at least one eye open, and at least one fist clenched, if we wish not to wake and find that he has got in, and that our hands, in a different sense from his, are in our pockets.

THE CENTURY DICTIONARY.*

THIS Dictionary appears with the names of a most extensive staff of collaborators. Without disputing the competence of these gentlemen in the special subjects which are mentioned under their names, we are free to confess that the names are mostly unknown to us. That may be due to our British ignorance. The Editor-in-chief is Mr. Whitney, who is well known on both sides of the Atlantic as a Sanskrit scholar and comparative philologist. We are far from suggesting that Mr. Whitney is not perfectly competent to edit an English Dictionary; nevertheless the days are past when Sanskrit was supposed to be the key to all Aryan languages, and every one who knew Sanskrit was expected to know and to teach comparative philology by nature. Philology, however, is not the main strength of this Dictionary. What it turns out to be is an improved Imperial Dictionary, with the technical element considerably reinforced, and a certain amount of much condensed philology worked in. The copyright of the Imperial Dictionary has been in some way acquired for the purposes of the present work, and terms have also been made with the owners of certain American copyrights alleged to have been infringed in the Imperial Dictionary itself. We are not told that the Imperial Dictionary has surrendered or merged its separate existence and rights; but it is difficult to see how the practical effect can be much less than a fusion.

One warning must be given to students of the language—a warning which is to some extent conveyed by the title, but which might be overlooked. This Dictionary aims at being an "encyclopedic lexicon." It is (like the Imperial Dictionary) illustrated with pretty frequent woodcuts, and the letterpress goes into scientific and technical explanation, often with minute detail. The philology and history of the English language, as a language, take a secondary rank. Accordingly, there can be no question of The Century Dictionary competing with the Oxford English Dictionary edited by Dr. Murray. It does not purport to do the same work, and, on the other hand, although it will be a much smaller book when completed, it undertakes various things which a philological dictionary, not being encyclopedic, purposely leaves aside. Dr. Murray's work has been "consulted" for A and part of B. For the future Dr. Murray will have in return whatever advantage he can get by consulting Mr. Whitney, or rather Mr. Whitney's collaborators. From such comparison as we have made of words in this first part with the same words in the Oxford English Dictionary, we are not disposed to think this will be very much. We have written "consulted" in quotation marks for a reason. Mr. Whitney and his staff, whom we shall now take leave to call the Centurions, have done less or more than consulting the Oxford Dictionary in the ordinary sense. We look out Anastatic, the name of a facsimile printing process now pretty well superseded. We find under it a mistaken explanation—namely, the reference of the name to the idea of printing from a raised plate instead of reviving. This mistake occurs also in the earlier issues of the first part of the Oxford Dictionary, but is corrected in later copies. Here, then, the Centurions have fallen short of what they might have justly done in the way of consultation. But, again, the season of the year moves us to look out All-hallows, with its offshoot All-hallown-summer, the good name of a good thing, whose substance we have been enjoying for sundry days. It is a word which the previous dictionary-makers have had little of any importance to say to. Here we find either a singular coincidence of independent researches in both the matter and the form of the result, or a little group of articles taken straight out of the Oxford Dictionary, with just so much condensation of the philology as makes them fit into the "encyclopedic" scheme. We do not charge the Centurions with an unfair use of Dr. Murray's materials. They could not be expected not to profit by good work done before them, though not much before; and it is difficult to see how else, in some cases, they could have used it at all.

* The Century Dictionary: an Encyclopedic Lexicon of the English Language. Prepared under the superintendence of William Dwight Whitney. 6 vols. Vol. I. New York: The Century Company; London: T. Fisher Unwin. 1889.

But this is surely a little more than consulting—as we understand consulting on this side of the ocean. It has been usual hitherto, as between scholars and gentlemen, to be rather more frank and full in acknowledgment of this kind of borrowing.

In matters of literary history and usage the Century Dictionary is altogether too meagre and too vague to be considered materially helpful to a student. Such forms of citation as “Lamb, Elia”; “Coleridge”; “Carlyle, Sartor Resartus, p. 40” (what edition?); “Hallam”; “Dickens”; “Granville”; are of constant occurrence, and the quotations are never dated. The word Abide is illustrated by, among other things, a passage from some one of the many English translations of The Imitation of Christ, of which neither the date nor the authorship is specified. Such a citation is, of course, absolutely without use or value. It proves only that the word was used by somebody at some time within about two hundred years.

On the other hand, those who seek encyclopædic knowledge will find a neat little optical essay under “Aberration,” a definition of the absolute zero under “Absolute,” the latest Italian opinions (without references) about Andrea Ferrara under that name (without a single literary example), and much more of the like sort. They may learn that, “though the adder is venomous, its bite is not certainly known to be fatal”; that add, attach, affix, annex, are different words, and do not precisely mean the same thing; and that the German word Abzug, more or less mispronounced, is used in (British or American?) metallurgy to signify “the first scum appearing on the surface of lead in the cupel.” As this jumble of odds and ends from all kinds of arts and sciences has been produced by enterprising publishers, and a philologist of reputation has given his name to it as “Editor-in-chief,” we must assume that it is an article for which there is a demand somewhere. If so, let it be made and sold by all means. But let it not hold itself out as an object of scientific or literary interest.

THE TREASURY OF SACRED SONG.*

THIS handsome volume contains a series of lyrical pieces of a religious character, selected from the poetry of the last four centuries, with notes, biographical and explanatory, and a very brief preface by the present Professor of Poetry in the University of Oxford. Mr. Palgrave says plainly that his first aim and leading principle in making this selection has been “to offer poetry for poetry’s sake”; and he foresees, we must admit justly, that many of his readers will miss poems of “spiritual aid and comfort,” as well as those which tend strictly to edification, and for this omission he seems hardly to make a sufficient, or sufficiently definite, apology. He thinks that “the subtle yet powerful aid of melody in words and beauty in form” will secure effectually “the elevation and enlightenment of the soul,” which, no doubt, is true, but does not quite account either for leaving out such poems as

which most readers will think one of Watts’s most happy efforts, or Miss Elliott’s “Thy will be done,” nor yet for including Keble’s

There is a book who runs may read, which leads off with a misquotation from the Bible, or Smart’s

When Israel’s ruler on the royal bed.

True, the first-named hymn is chiefly calculated for “spiritual aid and comfort,” but it has all the elements necessary to poetry in its composition, and, as given in Watts’s Hymns, not as in The Book of Praise, it contains a verse little known, but well worth quoting:—

His dying crimson like a robe
Spreads o’er his body on the tree;
Then I am dead to all the globe,
And all the globe is dead to me.

This comes before the last verse:—

Were the whole realm of nature mine.

We also miss another of Watts’s which seems, to an old-fashioned taste at least, to contain some poetry, although it is so simple that a child can understand and appreciate it to a great extent:—“There is a land of pure delight.” What has Mr. Palgrave to offer us better than this?

Sweet fields beyond the swelling flood
Stand dress’d in living green:
So to the Jews old Canaan stood,
While Jordan roll’d between.

The very simplicity of Watts tends to blind the reader to his many merits, while, no doubt, his too easy flow of versification makes a careful examination of all his work a serious task. As we are on the subject of Mr. Palgrave’s shortcomings, we may note, before proceeding to examine his collection more closely, some other omissions, for which it is not very easy to account. For example, we should expect to find “There is a fountain fill’d with blood,” because, though perhaps controversial, it is thoroughly poetical. We could have better understood Lord Selborne’s omission of such a hymn, but we find it in its place in The Book of Praise. Doctrine has not prevented Mr. Palgrave from printing Toplady’s little known “Compared with Christ, in all beside.” As another, and very serious omission, we may note that Mr. Palgrave has given us no example of Giles Fletcher. True, Fletcher is eccentric, but there is real poetry in some of his compositions, as, for example, in his triumphal hymn which the late Dr. Neale—no mean judge—considered to be among the most beautiful religious poems in the English language. Among modern writers we do not find anything by the lamented Mrs. Craik, yet Mr. Palgrave has few poems finer than her “Fishermen, not of Galilee,” or her “Psalm for New Year’s Eve.” We also miss the Advent hymn, “Lo! He comes,” a work of very composite origin. “From Greenland’s icy mountains” is, no doubt, very hackneyed, but we can hardly comprehend its omission, or that of Addison’s “The spacious firmament on high.” We could mention others that most people would expect to find in such a collection as this, but may try to explain their absence by concluding that Mr. Palgrave does not consider their poetry of a sufficiently elevated character. Here, of course, every one has his own opinion.

Poetry is not a thing to be defined; but all poetry must have one quality—it must be, literally, touching. It must appeal directly to our feelings. And this is more true of religious poetry than of any other. It was remarked on a former occasion when Mr. Palgrave edited a volume of selected songs and lyrics that he left out certain pathetic verses on the ground that they were only ingenious. It may be that some kinds of pathos do not touch him; but pathos of almost all kinds is the chief characteristic of religious poetry, and pervades nine out of ten successful hymns—being, in fact, the very element to which their success in touching our feelings is owed. To a religious mind, no doubt, mere doggerel, if it puts pious thoughts into words, may pass for poetry; and Mr. Palgrave is right in having endeavoured, as far as possible, to abstract his mind from such influences. In the result we cannot but feel that he has carried his efforts too far, and injured his book by so doing. Here, however, we may cease to find fault; and, allowing that there is room for such a volume as this beside The Book of Praise, we may proceed to examine its contents.

Mr. Palgrave begins with a specimen of “the fine flower of expiring Medievalism,” in an ode on the Nativity by William Dunbar. It is little known, but contains some beautiful verses, as, for example:—

Who ever in earth heard so blythe a story,
Or tidings of so great felicity?
As how the garthé of all grace and glory,
For love and mercy hath ta’en humanity.

Mr. Palgrave explains “garthé” as “garden.” He tells us of Dunbar that he was considered by Sir Walter Scott “a poet unrivalled by any that Scotland has ever produced.” Nevertheless, we cannot but regret that Mr. Palgrave has not led off with “Hierusalem, my happy home,” the more so because it appears to be, if not the oldest hymn in the language, at any rate the oldest still in constant use. The extract from the beautiful devotional poetry of Lord Vaux is all too short. The two sonnets, by Sir Philip Sidney and Shakspeare, are well contrasted; and Spenser’s poem on “Heavenly Love” will be welcomed, and new to many readers. The twelfth piece in the collection is the first which can be strictly described as a hymn, and is headed “O that I had wings like a dove.” It is anonymous, and apparently so little known that Lord Selborne has overlooked it. The last verse may be quoted:—

My weary wings, sweet Jesu, mark,
And when thou thinkest best
Stretch forth Thy arm from out the ark,
And take me to Thy rest.

Of this poem Mr. Palgrave tells us that it is attributed to a certain Nicholas Postgate, a “seminary priest,” who was put to death at York in 1679 for exercising illegal priestly functions. The sixteenth piece is also anonymous; it was printed, as Mr. Palgrave tells us, as early as 1601, and therefore would appear to be older than any of the foregoing. This we have already named—

Hierusalem, my happy home—

a hymn of which Lord Selborne remarks, that it is “the true English source of all the New Jerusalem hymns of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.” Mr. Palgrave seems rather to regard it as an echo of Cardinal Peter Damiani’s Ad perennis vitæ fontem; but the resemblance, except of a few verses, is not close, and there is not a single passage of direct translation. The late Dr. Neale printed it in a little volume on the Joys and Glories of Paradise, from the manuscript copy in the British Museum, and his version contains some stanzas we feel sure Mr. Palgrave would have included if he had seen them. Dr. Neale’s fourth verse runs thus:—

No dampish mist is seen in thee,
No cold nor darksome night;
There every soul shines as the sun;
There God himself gives light.

And towards the end, in addition to the stanza beginning “Our Lady sings Magnificat,” there are two which still more clearly show marks of the origin of the hymn among the Elizabethan Romanists. In the first there is mention of

* The Treasury of Sacred Song. Selected by Francis T. Palgrave. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 1889.

St. Ambrose and St. Austin, and of "Ould Simeon and Zacharie," and the second runs thus:—

There Magdalene hath left her mone
And cheerfullie doth singe
With blessed saints, whose harmonie
In everie street doth ringe.

In all, Mr. Palgrave's version consists of eleven verses; while Dr. Neale has printed twenty-six. Our ordinary hymn-books only, as a rule, contain about half a dozen. The author seems to have been a friar whose initials were B. P., but so far he has not been further identified.

We have perhaps delayed too long over what is probably the oldest of English hymns still in use; having done so partly because Mr. Palgrave seems to have hardly appreciated its importance. But there is so much in this volume to tempt the reader to linger and learn, that we must be content to indicate briefly its scope and Mr. Palgrave's undoubted success in forming for us a religious anthology of the highest value. Not confining himself solely to hymns, but ranging over the whole field of Christian lyrical verse, he is able to introduce his readers to Henry Vaughan, as well as to Herbert and Donne, and others who are better known, and to comprehend Milton's "Ode on the Nativity," with Lady Nairne's "Land o' the Leal," and Clough's Qui Laborat Orat, with Lord Tennyson's dramatic scene "In a Children's Hospital." It is interesting to see the three Tennyson brothers, as well as Lady Tennyson, represented here. The arrangement of the whole work is mainly chronological. Book I. ends with Shepherd, who died in 1739. Book II. begins with Cowley, includes Ken, Tate, Watts, Toplady, Wesley, and all that great school of hymn-writers down to Mrs. Barbauld, who died in 1825. The modern school begins in Book III. with Heber, and includes a large selection from Keble and many beautiful poems of later and even contemporary writers, though the editor, with an uncommon modesty, has excluded any extracts from his own work. The biographical and explanatory notes are full of new and interesting information over which it would be only too easy to linger; and the volume concludes with an index of first lines and a list of the hymn-writers quoted, with their dates. We observe that Dr. Horatius Bonar is mentioned without date, as if still living; a sweet singer was lost to the Church when he died some two or three years ago.

REMINISCENCES AND MEMORIES.*

THE author of Reminiscences of a Boyhood is, in the words of Iago, a "wight" to "chronicle small beer." He is a worthy and an educated old gentleman, whose views upon most subjects win admiration and respect. A dweller, apparently, in Sleepy Hollow, he has let the world run on almost out of his sight, and has, it must almost seem, fallen back upon the tales of his youth, as Heine sang, to solace his loneliness, or cover his fright. He is at some pains to hide his identity, and the facts that his Christian name is Lancelot, shortened by his intimates into "Lanti," that he was born early in the century in the North of Ireland, of a genuine Irish stock, adopted by an aunt, and educated in Edinburgh, constitute practically all the information concerning himself he vouchsafes. He is at no pains to grace with flowers of rhetoric or sympathy the bare scaffolding of his revelations. In a book avowedly concerning boyhood it is, of course, unjust to expect a closing carillon of wedding bells. Our author delights, however, to maintain an air of mystery. What has been his profession, who he is, and whether he ever married, are subjects on which he forbids the reader to seek for information. To him and to all he elects to remain a shadow. In this there is nothing of which to complain. During the period in which he is accompanied by the reader he undergoes two sharpish attacks of calf-love, and in the prosperity, or otherwise, of his wooing he is scarcely able to interest himself. His sisters are, however, fairly sympathetic, and a word or two more as to their fortunes would have been welcome.

Practically, then, the book supplies a few incidents, they cannot be called adventures, in a singularly uneventful career—a few reflections distinguished for justice and piety rather than novelty, quotations from half a dozen or a dozen poets, from Gray to Mr. Matthew Arnold, and a few stories, told principally at second-hand, and not too easy of acceptance. What is individual in men or things the author fails to grasp. No picture of Edinburgh or of Westmoreland is conveyed, there is scarcely a touch of local colour, and the characters by which he is surrounded are as ghostlike and impalpable as he declares himself. Once in the early chapters an uncle is shot in the shoulder by a robber, and near the close the hero fights a drawn battle with a schoolmate. Here is all the direct adventure of the book; for twice-told anecdotes are not entitled to count. The whole, in short, to make a very honouring comparison, is silly sooth,

And dallies with the innocence of youth
Like the old age.

A reader in a happy frame of mind may ramble on to the end amused at trivialities, suspicious of assertions, interested in his own despite. If we could accept as true all that is put before us, the borders of the partly known world would be indefinitely enlarged, and societies for psychical research would have their hands full. As a proof of Milesian descent, the family is entitled to a Banshee, and a Banshee it accordingly has. Every death is heralded by heart-broken lamentations, sobbings, and cries from the adjacent trees. This, however, is nothing. Our author himself sees the sun dance on Easter Day. This pretty and poetical superstition is known to folklorists, and accepted by Suckling, in the famous lines:—

She dances such a way,
No sun upon an Easter Day
Is half so fine a sight.

Hitherto no case of credible evidence attesting its truth has been produced. Our author, however, gets up at about four or five o'clock, needlessly early, it might be assumed, and this is what he sees:—"There were the sun and moon, as astronomers would say, in conjunction, the moon, a silvery lucid orb, close to the glowing globe of the sun, and then began some solemn and mystic movement, a rhythmic dance, slow and stately, in undulating and harmonious motion, as if they moved to the music of the spheres." Similar sharpness of apprehension was not confined to the sight. It extended to the hearing and other faculties. In the last chapter he chronicles the death of his aunt, by whom he was adopted:—

On Holy Eve my aunt died; and as I stood by that death-bed, I say it solemnly and truly, I heard the rush of the spirit as it left the body and passed by me, and was borne as on wings upward. The sound was like the sweep of a strong current of air; nor was it a sound only; it was as if the passage of the spirit could be felt, just as a strong wind touches your cheek or stirs your hair.

"Such tricks hath strong imagination!" Stories even more marvellous than these are told on report, and many interesting relics of superstitious belief are quoted. Far more credible and stimulating are, however, the few facts that are given concerning animals. A gander named "Jack" is lovingly depicted, his friendship with old "Tally-ho," a blind horse, whom twice every day he led to the water, is very touching, and his death—accidentally killed by his blind companion, who subsequently refused food and pined away—is harrowing. In dealing with points such as this our author is at his best.

Of critics the writer has no very high opinion, and he propounds a question we will not strive to answer:—"How can criticism be considered as an art when men ignorant alike of art or culture, whose opinion you would not take in the commonest matters, are engaged to deliver judgment on works into whose merits they can but very imperfectly enter?" An anonymous instance of a man of this class engaged on a literary periodical of importance is advanced.

While in Edinburgh the hero visited occasionally the theatre, and saw Kean in Richard III., Charles Young in Hamlet and Macbeth, and other actors in less important parts. His admiration is warm rather than articulate. He does not, at least, convey any new impression as to the actors concerned, and, like many inexperienced critics, cannot discriminate between the claims of the author and those of the interpreter. His visits to the theatre appear to have been few, and he looks askance upon stage exhibitions, collecting opinions hostile to them, and thinking it better to deny himself the pleasure of the theatre than to sanction by his presence "an amusement which involves grave moral danger to those who, from their physical gifts and mental susceptibilities, are drawn by the fascinations of the acted drama to make the stage a profession."

We part from our author with some regret. He has little to tell that is worth telling, and the world will not pause to listen to his counsel or his pleadings. He leads us, however, by quiet footpaths through a pleasant, if not very picturesque, land, and he opens out to us a nature which commands our sympathies, if it cannot extort our admiration.

Lester Wallack's Memories of Fifty Years have been collected by Mr. Laurence Hutton, a Boswell to this histrionic Johnson. To completeness or consecutiveness they make no pretence, having been recounted in familiar conversation, taken down by a stenographer, and published without full supervision from Wallack, who died before the whole was transcribed. Very pleasant reading do they constitute, and the volume, overflowing with portraits and other illustrations, is an agreeable possession. That the reminiscences are in the full sense trustworthy cannot be said. What memories—theatrical memories especially—extending over fifty years can be so? Much valuable and some important information is however conveyed, and the book, besides being agreeable reading, is a welcome contribution to stage history. Especially useful is Mr. Hutton's preliminary history of the Wallack family.

Nothing specially exciting is there in Lester Wallack's career, which was successful from the first. He entered on the boards by the golden gate, and though, with an artistic conscientiousness which is eminently creditable, he determined, on adopting the stage as a profession, to live on his very moderate earnings, and vexed his mother's soul by refusing to accept eleemosynary five-pound notes, he knew few or none of the pangs which at that period used to afflict the young actor. From the moment he grows loquacious it is, very creditably, concerning those he meets rather than himself. His garrulity concerning these gives a chief grace to the book. First he becomes acquainted with a "young cornet in the Fifth Dragoon Guards," six feet six in height, and "a remarkably handsome, though boyish, looking fellow." This is Sir William Don, concerning whose artistic career he has not much to say. Don had, however, a little of the true comedian, and his wife, Emily Sanders, or Saunders, was, thirty-five years ago, an attraction at the Edinburgh Theatre. He witnessed the Post-Office riots in Dublin à propos to Bianconi, in which, with his regiment, Don dispersed the mob. Of the sharpness of Dublin audiences he has much to say. At Manchester he was Benedick to the Beatrice of Miss Helen Faucit, now Lady Martin, and speaks of her "as one of the most sympathetic actresses who ever walked the English stage." G. V. Brooke made, it is said, when first, at the Olympic, he came out as Othello, "almost as great a hit as Edmund Kean did when he appeared as Shylock." His success "was instantaneous and complete; but, unlike that of Kean, it was not followed up at all." C. J. Mathews and his two wives are described, Mathews himself being exhibited in a favourable light. Wallack's warmest admiration is bestowed upon Herr Barnay, the German actor, whom he saw in light comedy, as well as in Mark Antony and Lear. The sisters Cushman, Benjamin Webster, Mr. Dion Boucicault, are dealt with; and, on the strength of his father's memories, some fairly good stories are told of Wewitzer and Elliston. Playing Falstaff in Henry IV. the latter was so drunk that, after stabbing the dead Percy in the thigh, he was unable to get up, and Wallack had to come on the stage and hoist the inanimate actor like a sack upon his shoulder. In the mad scene in The Belle's Stratagem it is customary for the Doricourt to gag at will. When Lester Wallack was playing this character, Elliston being incapacitated by gout, the famous mad elephant on Exeter Change had just been shot. He exclaimed accordingly, in his assumed delirium, "Bring me a pickled elephant"—an impromptu which, however unpardonable, drew shouts of laughter. Elliston pretended to be much disgusted at its success; and, shaking his fist at Wallack, exclaimed, "D—n it, you lucky rascal; they never killed an elephant for me when I played Doricourt." Charles Kean and "Ellen," William Farren, Sothorn, and many other English actors are summoned and dismissed. All the leading American actors are passed in review, and stories are told concerning some of them; and there are a few recollections of Thackeray, Sir John Millais, and other non-theatrical celebrities. The unambitious purpose of the volume is, in fact, fulfilled. A list, held to be perfect, of the characters—about three hundred in all—played by Wallack constitutes an appendix.

MARY WOLLSTONECRAFT SHELLEY.*

IF Mrs. Julian Marshall had confined her work to the limits of the second volume, and had called it "Mary Shelley's Widowhood," the Greek proverb would have been fulfilled. The half would have been better than the whole. Mrs. Marshall has been permitted to make use of MS. journals and letters, and she has compiled her work carefully and neatly; but all the early part of the history needed no repetition. Mrs. Shelley's years of widowhood were those of which the world knew least, and the picture of her later life shows in her an amiable character; with sense, affection, resolution, and an admirable hatred of notoriety. But about this lady, in her girlhood and as the wife of Shelley, there seems nothing new to be said that is much worth the saying. Professor Dowden and all the other cloud of witnesses have told us at least as much as we want to know, in their Lives of Shelley himself. Mary Godwin, in these early years, was not, of course, free from faults; but even a censorious judgment cannot blame her severely for the traits that we regret. A girl of sixteen, brought up by a predatory Radical Pecksniff like Godwin and by his detestable wife—a girl addressed by a man so fascinating as Shelley, must have been rather more than mortal if she refused to do what her heart demanded, and what the social theories of her father and her lover approved. As to Mary's heartlessness about that "nasty woman Harriet," she was a woman herself, with a woman's power of believing what she wished to believe. Even at an age more mature than sixteen ladies are not apt to be fair judges of their rivals; and Mary, of course, heard only one side of the question. In her later life she showed so much dignity, loyalty, and justice that we may fairly regard these as essential elements in her character, and her behaviour in the matter of the true Mrs. Shelley as the accident of youth, passion, and education.

On the eternal topic of Harriet Mrs. Marshall has nothing fresh to say. The partisans of Shelley believe that he had found his wife faithless before he ran away with Godwin's daughter. "No contemporary document now exists which puts the case beyond the reach of argument," says Mrs. Marshall. Did any such document ever exist? and, if so, how did it cease to be extant? About that we learn nothing. Shelley's own belief has nothing to do with the case. In all ways he was incapable of discerning between what he believed, what he wished to believe, and what he merely fancied without cause. His whole biography is full of visions, and the faithlessness of Harriet may very well have been among these. As the Greek historian says, it has "won its way to the mythical," and we might as well investigate the character of Tyro, daughter of Salmoneus. It is certain that Shelley asked his wife to come and stay with him, Mary Godwin, and Miss Claremont. He could hardly have had a very low opinion of Harriet when he did this. Mrs. Marshall says that Harriet was "cross and provoking" after Mary went off with Harriet's husband. This is not a very kind or sympathetic statement. What would Mrs. Marshall like Harriet to have done? She understands Godwin well, at all events, and does not conceal the absurdities and meannesses of a philosopher who sometimes reminds one nearly as much of Mr. Micawber as of Mr. Pecksniff.

In the first volume Miss Claremont is the person about whom we hear most that is new. Lord Byron was a bold bad man, but Nemesis, in the shape of Miss Claremont, pursued him with a foot by no means halting. The life that minx led him, and the life that he led her after their separation, were powerful moral lessons. Godwin held that men should marry, if marry they must, with great caution. No less caution should be used in having anything to do with minxes. In their case, we cannot say with a character of Gyp's, le mauvais motif, c'est encore le mieux. In her later years, when Miss Claremont had been invited to Field Place, Mrs. Shelley remarked that Clare had been "the bane of her life since she was three years old." Shelley wrote to her as "his best Clare," but she was Mary's worst Clare. She was always there, a third person between Mary and her husband, who found her a diverting companion. We quote an amazing example of their spiritual adventures:—

Shelley says to Jane, "Good-night"; his hand is leaning on the table; he is conscious of an expression in his countenance which he cannot repress. Jane hesitates. "Good-night" again. She still hesitates.

"Did you ever read the tragedy of Orra?" said Shelley.

"Yes. How horribly you look!—take your eyes off."

"Good-night" again, and Jane runs to her room. Shelley, unable to sleep, kissed Mary, and prepared to sit beside her and read till morning, when rapid footsteps descended the stairs. Jane was there; her countenance was distorted most unnaturally by horrible dismay—it beamed with a whiteness that seemed almost like light; her lips and cheeks were of one deadly hue; the skin of her face and forehead was drawn into innumerable wrinkles—the lineaments of terror that could not be contained; her hair came prominent and erect; her eyes were wide and staring, drawn almost from the sockets by the convulsion of the muscles; the eyelids were forced in, and the eyeballs, without any relief, seemed as if they had been newly inserted, in ghastly sport, in the sockets of a lifeless head. This frightful spectacle endured but for a few moments—it was displaced by terror and confusion, violent indeed, and full of dismay, but human. She asked me if I had touched her pillow (her tone was that of dreadful alarm). I said, "No, no! if you will come into the room I will tell you." I informed her of Mary's pregnancy; this seemed to check her violence. She told me that a pillow placed upon her bed had been removed in the moment that she turned her eyes away to a chair at some distance, and evidently by no human power. She was positive as to the facts of her self-possession and calmness. Her manner convinced me that she was not deceived. We continued to sit by the fire, at intervals engaging in awful conversation relative to the nature of these mysteries. I read part of Alexy; I repeated one of my own poems. Our conversation, though intentionally directed to other topics, irresistibly recurred to these. Our candles burned low; we feared they would not last until daylight.

Jane, in this narrative, is, of course, Clare, who crowned herself with that title, like Miss Blanche Amory, out of her own will and fantasy. All Mrs. Shelley's wishes were "a garden et absentia Claire." Probably Shelley was never in love with Clare, but her position in the household gave rise to the hideous and distressing scandals about which Byron seems to have behaved so badly. As to Miss Claremont's views of Byron, they are expressed with satisfactory freedom, and coincide with much that Mr. Thackeray said on several occasions. About Emilia Viviani we learn nothing new, and if Shelley really made his wife unhappy about Mrs. Williams, it is certain that Mrs. Williams, when she became Mrs. Hogg, made her more unhappy yet by her gossip. Mrs. Shelley, while at Casa Magni, was very ill, morbid too, and discontented. Shelley was unusually well, and in high spirits. He was fey, there is not a doubt of it. He had the wild spirits of fey men; he walked in sleep, and saw portents and visions, his own double, and other apparitions. Mrs. Williams saw his wraith when Trelawny, who was present, saw nothing. The story of the time at Lerici reads like the end of a Saga, when the air is full of omens. Had Shelley not been fey, he probably would not have set out on his fatal voyage, for the tempest was visibly approaching.

Mrs. Shelley's letters and diaries after Shelley's death are most gloomy reading, yet not without interest in their gloom. Whatever her husband's opinions may have been, she believed in a future life, and in re-union with him. Her chief comfort, while Leigh Hunt was quarrelling with her about the possession of the Cor Cordium, was the friendship of Trelawny. The capricious wanderer was true to her then, and for long afterwards; it is plain that he wished to marry her later, but she was wiser. "My name will never be Trelawny. I am not so young as I was when you first knew me, but I am as proud. I must have the entire affection, devotion, and, above all, the solicitous protection of any one who would win me. You belong to womankind in general, and Mary Shelley will never be yours." But she worked hard at Trelawny's business with publishers, and she displayed, as it seems, a constant and loyal camaraderie which Trelawny seems to have forgotten when he wrote the later parts of his Reminiscences. She declined in extreme poverty to make money out of "Reminiscences" herself; she worked hard at novels, now forgotten; she insisted on fulfilling Shelley's wishes, and sending their son, Percy, to a public school. She resisted many attempts to make her shriek for woman's freedom on platforms or in the press. "My belief is, whether there be sex in souls or not, that the sex of our material mechanism makes us quite different creatures, better, though weaker, but wanting in the higher grades of intellect." This is the opinion of the woman who wrote Frankenstein at twenty. In London she saw her novel dramatized, and was amused by it, though, as Mrs. Marshall justly remarks, it is no better fitted for the stage than Mr. Stevenson's famous fantasy. While Godwin lived he was a constant charge on his daughter. His first letter to her after Shelley's death is a cold discussion of money matters, and is written in the spirit of a hound. There are moments many when Godwin seems more detestable than Marat, Chaka, and Tartufe rolled into one. There are moments, too, when one almost pities Clare, a governess in Russia. Her letters are not amusing, except when she attacks Byron, and are extremely verbose. The most sympathetic person in the book, indeed, is poor Fanny Godwin, till the fortitude and dignity of Mrs. Shelley win the respect which this Life cannot fail to inspire.

THE PRACTICE OF MEDICINE.*

THE scope of medical science is now so wide, and the centrifugal growth continues with such ever-accelerating speed, that the difficulty of writing a text-book on the whole "Practice of Medicine" which shall be up to date, and at the same time of not overwhelming bulk, has enormously increased. The faculty of selecting essentials only, of giving proportionate emphasis to different points, and presenting a clear, broad conception of a subject so vast and intricate, is certainly a rare one. The author of the work before us evidently possesses a goodly share of this faculty, as he has condensed his materials most judiciously, and compiled a text-book which, in the main, is eminently readable, practical, and convenient. The chapter on Fevers (pp. 35-41) is altogether admirable and contains the essence of many a treatise of far more portentous length. We think, however, that there is hardly logical warrant for the inference "that typhoid epidemics are most apt to develop when fruits, ripe or unripe, are principally taken, as during the months from August to November, while they are fewer from December to April." Many factors besides fruit might as fairly be named as prevailing during autumn—such as high or sudden alternations of temperature. The custom of taking holidays at this season, too often living in most unsanitary lodgings, and obtaining water and milk from uninspected sources, seems far more likely to be the reason of the autumnal increase of typhoid. Moreover, there is no reason to suppose that the typhoid germ can exist in fruit—we know that it luxuriates in milk and in sewage-contaminated water. It seems inexpedient to separate erysipelas into two varieties, and to speak of one as idiopathic, seeing that it is due to the invasion of a specific micro-organism in all cases, and never arises spontaneously in the tissues. It is probably this idea of an idiopathic erysipelas which has caused non-bacterial erythematata to be so often mistaken for it. The chapter on Cancer is not up to the level of most of the rest of the book—all mention of treatment being ignored. Certainly the least satisfactory section of the work is that which treats of Skin Diseases, in which the morphological classification of Willan is reproduced for the mystification of the student; of which it may truly be said, that it is quite impossible to obtain a broad and clear conception of the etiology and pathology of any given disease from its place in that scheme. It reminds us, in fact, of Dr. Caius's classification of "Dogges," in which the Moone (Canis Lunarius) was gravely placed as a distinct species, on account of his propensity for "bawing and wawing at the moone." The details of this section by no means show the author at his best.

The illustrations are fairly good, but there is an obvious error at p. 31, where bacilli are depicted, and stated to be magnified 200 diameters. As represented, they are magnified at least 1,200.

The author gives due weight to the results of bacteriological research in regard to many diseases, but we think that mention ought to have been made of the experiments and views of Löffler and of Ranvier in connexion with diphtheria; of Gibier and of Roeser in connexion with pemphigus; of Lustgarten in connexion with syphilis.

On the whole, however, the shortcomings of the work are few and insignificant, compared with the amount of solid and sound information contained in it; and the student who has thoroughly mastered its contents must be held to be very well grounded in the "Practice of Medicine."

MR. FRANCIS NEWMAN.†

WE desire to preface what we have to say of the volume before us with an expression of respect for the incessant and varied mental activity of the writer, prolonged now into advanced age, for the disinterestedness which has marked his pursuit and proclamation of what he thinks truth, and for the courage with which he has promoted what he deems right. He has fallen into what we judge serious errors, he has propounded schemes which would shock the good sense of a Laputan projector. We may mention, for instance, his plan for the division of England, exclusive of Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, to which similar treatment is to be applied, into an octarchy of provinces. Mr. Newman has worked out this device with something of the minuteness of a Parliamentary draftsman instructed to draw up a Bill on the subject. He has grouped his counties together, assigned each group its capital, and given it its distinctive name—in every case terminating in ia, for the greater convenience of the adjective-ending ian. "We see in Colombia, Georgia, Virginia, Caffraria, Tasmania, Tyburnia, Belgravia, how readily Englishmen adopt it." Thus we have "EBORACIA, or, by contraction, BRACIA—namely, Northumberland, Durham, and Yorkshire. Capital, York (Eboracum)." "FENNIA (land of the Fens?): namely, Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridgeshire, Huntingdonshire, Rutland, Nottinghamshire, Lincolnshire. Capital, Peterborough," Westia, Lunia, and the like, for the details of which we may refer our readers to Mr. Newman's pages. If he had intended his essay as a reduction to absurdity of Mr. Gladstone's projects, it would have possessed considerable merit as a political satire. But Mr. Newman's paper was written, or rather his lecture was given, for it was addressed in the first instance to the ears of the Manchester Athenæum—no one will think, we hope, of Mr. Peter MacGrowler's perversion of the last word—ten years before Mr. Gladstone had found salvation. Mr. Newman is as serious as Mr. John Morley himself.

* The Practice of Medicine. By M. Charteris, M.D., Professor of Therapeutics and Materia Medica, Glasgow University, &c. Fifth edition. London: J. & J. Churchill. 1888.

† Miscellanies, Vol. III.—Essays, Tracts or Addresses, Political and Social. By F. W. Newman, Emeritus Professor of University College, London; Honorary Fellow of Worcester College, Oxford; once Fellow of Balliol College, Oxford, and M.B.A.S. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co. 1889.

There is very much in this volume of a more rational kind, though throughout there are traces of a certain flightiness of mind which explains much that is strange in the author's career. He is not only versatile, but volatile. He skips from subject to subject with agile industry, leaving his mark on everything which he touches, but not penetrating very deeply into it, or exhausting it. If Mr. Newman had only been "unanimous," he would possibly have achieved some great result. If he had attempted fewer things, he might have done much more. The title of this book really expresses the character of his mind. It is a miscellany containing, like the village shop of the general dealer, a great variety of articles, each in its separate drawer or on its separate shelf, but possessing nothing in common, and seeming to be rather strangely and incongruously brought together. There seems to be no unity linking together Mr. Newman's great and varied acquirements and his endless suggestions, and making them tributary to some monumental work or to some lifelong design. In this his habit of mind is singularly distinguished from that of his illustrious brother. Cardinal Newman's wide knowledge of history and literature, his imaginative and philosophic power, have all been tributary to one aim, that of restoring the authority of religion and the religion of authority to its proper place in the minds and conduct of Englishmen. The same devotion to one dominant conception of human life, expressing itself in historic and biographic narrative, in pamphlet and essay, through tears and grimaces, in pathos and buffoonery, made Mr. Carlyle a power through two generations of Englishmen. Mr. Francis Newman has frequently startled his contemporaries, he has often stimulated them, he has occasionally instructed them. But he cannot be said in any considerable degree or permanent manner to have influenced them.

The most remarkable feature of the volume of Miscellanies now before us is the attitude of antagonism in which it presents its author to the doctrine of Cabinet government, and Ministerial responsibility to and dependence on a Parliamentary majority, which Lord Macaulay held to be the crowning result of the ages and the greatest birth of time, and which stirred the sceptical and mocking humour of Mr. Bagehot to real enthusiasm. Mr. Newman prefers the complete separation of the executive and legislative powers which he finds in the United States, where Ministers depend on the President and not on Congress, in which they have no seats, and which cannot affect their tenure of office any more than it can affect the duration of the Parliamentary term. The English system certainly has its weak points, the American system has its strong ones, and Mr. Newman points out both with great force and ingenuity. He counts it an absurdity that Lord Salisbury's (then Lord Cranborne) just and beneficent administration of India should have been brought to a close because he differed from Mr. Disraeli on the suffrage question. The result, no doubt, was unfortunate. If Lord Salisbury had been merely Minister for India, if he had been simply the head of a department, his retirement would have been as ridiculous as Mr. Newman thinks. But, as a member of the Cabinet, he was Minister for England as well as Minister for India. Minister for England in the first place, and Minister for India in the second place. The organization of each political department, making its good working to a considerable degree independent of its Parliamentary chief, diminishes these evils, which only in very rare cases are considerable. If not Amurath an Amurath, yet Tweedledum a Tweedledee succeeds, and there is usually no noticeable difference in their administrative powers. Mr. Newman says truly that the control of the House of Commons over the Executive has diminished by virtue of its power of making and unmaking Governments by votes of want of confidence or decisive defeats on vital questions, checked only by the Minister's power of unmaking and making the House of Commons by a dissolution and general election. These tremendous powers can only rarely be called into play; the game of life and death cannot be a thing of daily occurrence. This fact, we maintain in opposition to Mr. Newman, is one of the principal merits of the English system. The constant meddling of a body, incompetent for that purpose, in the conduct of the different departments of State would soon make administration impossible. Our Parliamentary system, at its best, is a serious obstacle in the way of continuity in foreign policy and the steadfast conduct of business. The evil is endured for the sake of the greater advantages which accompany it. Its extension might shift the weight to the other scale. Mr. Newman holds, and we are inclined to think that he is right, that the function of control is exercised more thoroughly by the House of Lords than by the House of Commons. Its criticism, he says, "is generally more thorough and searching than that of the Commons, not solely because the Lords have less to do (though there is much in that), but also because they are far more fearless, and are less biased by side glances at the danger of disgusting a Ministry." Control, as Mr. Newman says, is preventive, and schemes of legislation and policy are shaped, not merely or usually to disarm the prejudices of the peers, but to confront the criticism which they will meet in the Upper Chamber, which is usually of a more deliberate and searching kind than is possible to the faction fighting into which debating in the Commons has a tendency to sink. When Mr. Newman proposes to strengthen this controlling power of the Lords by giving to every peer a right to go down to the Foreign Office, and see any despatch or confidential paper he chooses to ask for, and would prevent this privilege from falling into unworthy hands by requiring that, before any person is recommended to Her Majesty for a peerage, the House of Commons shall declare by a vote his fitness, by reason of his public merit, to be a legislator in the Upper House, we get again, we fear, into the latitude of Laputa.

Mr. Newman has, we are glad to observe, a very healthy sense of the demerits of that "government from below" which is known as agitation, a distrust of "freedom without culture," the results of which are exhibited in the Irish and German government of some American cities, and a somewhat startling readiness to approve the methods "which good and moral Englishmen are apt to malign as despotic," which "Freedom, awakening from her surfeit and regaining sobriety," is prone to adopt. Mr. Newman's obvious liking for Napoleon III. springs possibly from this side of his mind and character. We cannot conclude our notice of this volume without mentioning Mr. Newman's entirely admirable vindication of capital and corporal punishments, in appropriate cases, against the sickly sentimentalism of certain maudlin friends of humanity. It is curious to find a paper which would not discredit Sir Henry Maine or Sir James Stephen side by side with articles which might have been written by Miss Frances Power Cobbe, Mrs. Josephine Butler, and Mr. James Stansfeld on the subjects which they have respectively made their own.

FEW biographers of modern actors have been more fortunate than Mr. Pemberton in securing materials for that "working up" which is so indispensable in the preparation of "Lives" of great or little men. And it may be added that no author has ever had more entertaining details to recount than those associated with the career of that late lamented idol of the stage, as well as of the public, Edward Askew Sothorn. This diverting volume, it must be admitted, contains no inconsiderable quantity of forgotten, or at any rate half-forgotten, theatrical history. Not that this is any demerit; on the contrary, it makes the book all the fresher and more amusing than it could otherwise have been. Reading Mr. Pemberton's interesting pages, we are struck by the remembrance of how much we have forgotten concerning the dramatic story of a quarter of a century ago, so that, even were the Memoir of the indisputably great comedian a far less inferior production than in reality it is, we should welcome it as an exceedingly valuable chapter of theatrical history. It will doubtless be in the nature of news to many that Mr. Sothorn made his "first appearance on any stage" at St. Helier's, exactly forty years ago, as the low-born and, as some excellent judges consider, rather bombastic hero of The Lady of Lyons; and we are told that his impersonation of the love-sick gardener was so eminently successful as to determine the young gentleman to adopt the stage as a means of livelihood. "He resolved," says his biographer, "to burn his boats, and become an actor in right-down earnest." He appeared, adopting the still-prevailing fashion, under a nom de théâtre, "Douglas Stuart," nor did he resume his rightful appellation until he had made a fair start in America. His early dramatic training was, as may be imagined, considerably varied, and we find him, while still "feeling his feet" at Jersey, cast, on one occasion when the pièce de résistance was Hamlet, for Laertes, the Ghost, and the second actor! Leaving Wolverhampton, Sothorn was fortunate enough to be offered an engagement at the Birmingham Theatre under the control of the genial and discerning Mr. Mercer Simpson—one of the good old school of provincial managers. Thirty shillings a week was his wage, and Frank Friskley, in Boots at the "Swan," was his rôle; and when, eleven years later, he entered upon his starring engagement at the Haymarket, he was announced as "formerly of the Theatre Royal, Birmingham, and from the principal American theatres." As present-day actors still do, Sothorn went to the United States in quest both of fame and dollars; that he found them both needs no telling. Five pounds a week cannot have been considered to have been a bad salary for a comparative novice thirty years ago, even in the land of "the Almighty dollar"; anyhow that was what "Douglas Stuart" got at the National Theatre, Boston, for his inglorious performance of Dr. Pangloss, and of a small part in a farce called John Dobbs. Such a conspicuous failure, indeed, was the young actor in the Heir-at-Law, that he was positively dismissed for incapacity, and driven to play juvenile parts at reduced salary at the Howard Athenæum, likewise in Boston. We get a characteristic description of "what Sothorn was like at this eventful period of his career," in what Mr. Pemberton good-naturedly terms "a pleasant brochure entitled 'Birds of a Feather,'" that appeared eleven years ago in America, written, it seems, by a Mrs. Vincent, "a veteran actress on the Boston stage and Sothorn's lifelong friend." Mr. "Douglas Stuart" was, we read, "tall, willowy, and lithe, with a clear red-and-white English complexion, bright blue eyes, wavy brown hair; graceful in carriage, and well calculated physically to conciliate the heart of susceptible woman. . . . I should say he was three- or four-and-twenty, but behind the footlights he did not look as if he were more than sixteen. He had a singularly sweet voice"; which was certainly more than he had in after years, when, as we remember only too well, his tones were painfully hard and rasping. Mrs. Vincent is careful to tell us the reason, or one of the reasons, of Sothorn's failure at Boston. "The truth is that he had been overpraised. The manager of the National Theatre had announced that he was going to bring to America 'the greatest actor that had ever appeared on its stage,' and thus had aroused the expectations of the people to such a degree that they were naturally disappointed; hence his failure. Besides, he was not old enough to make a sensation. He could not even make up properly." However this may be, the eminent showman now in London thought him "good enough" for his New York Museum, and engaged him to play there. Washington and Baltimore were in turn visited, and Sothorn's "Kinchin," in Flowers of the Forest, apparently suited his audiences. While happening by great good luck to be cast for "Armand Duval" in a version of La Dame aux Camélias at Wallack's, he was voted a success, and "received for the first time in his life several enthusiastic calls." In this way Sothorn laid the foundation of future triumphs; his drooping spirits revived under the genial warmth of the applause of Mr. Wallack's patrons; and when, after a four years' engagement with that manager, he left him, it was to join Miss Laura Keane and her company in New York. What his temperament was at the time we see by an extract from one of his letters:—"God be praised, there are brighter days in store, and I'm as much the old Ned Sothorn in heart and feeling as ever, though grey hairs have been forced through the hot-bed of my weary skull. If I've no genius, I at least have indisputable perseverance. . . . I have made a big mark in New York this season. My time is as sure to come if I live as there is a sun in the heavens." He was now deeply desirous of returning to England, and sent to a friend a list of his "crack parts"—Charles Surface, Dr. Pangloss (oblivious of his recent failure), Lytleton Coke (Old Heads and Young Hearts), Young Marlow, Bob Acres, Charles Courtley (London Assurance), Benedick, Harry Jasper (Bachelor of Arts), Gossamer (Live When You Can), Raphael (The Marble Heart), Armand (Camélias), St. Pierre (The Wife), and Claude Melnotte. He had perfected himself in eight other rôles, and fortune seemed disposed to smile upon him, until he went into management on his own account, with the result, in his own words, that he "had an awful season," and got "this time a sickener."

It was on the 12th of May, 1858, that Our American Cousin was produced at Miss Laura Keane's theatre, Sothorn, "much to his disgust," being "cast for the subordinate character of Lord Dundreary, who was intended to be an old man, and who had only forty-seven lines to speak." Sothorn only took the part on condition that he might "re-write it on lines of his own," and he began by "putting into it everything he had seen that had struck him as wildly absurd." Some two or three weeks elapsed ere the public understood what was meant by what they considered (and no wonder) "mad eccentricity." But, once the idea was comprehended, Lord Dundreary's popularity was a thing assured, and very soon he converted a not very interesting or brilliant play into one of the greatest attractions that the American stage had ever known:—

Everything about the part—the famous make-up, the wig, the whiskers, and the eye-glass, the eccentric yet faultless costumes, the lisp and stagger, the ingenious distortion of old aphorisms, were the outcome of Sothorn's own ready thought. Only one thing connected with the impersonation—the quaint little hop (that odd "impediment in the gait" which became as much part and parcel of his Lordship as the impediment in his speech), was the result of accident. At rehearsal one cold day, Sothorn, who was ever of a restless disposition, was endeavouring to keep himself warm by hopping about at the back of the stage, when Miss Keane sarcastically inquired if he was going to introduce it in Dundreary? Among the bystanding actors and actresses this created a laugh, and Sothorn, who at the time was out of temper with his part, replied, in his gravest manner, "Yes, Miss Keane; that's my view of the character." Having so far committed himself, he felt bound to go on with it; and, finding as the rehearsal progressed that the whole company, including the scene-shifters, were convulsed with laughter, he at night made capital out of a modified hop.

When, twenty-nine years ago, Mr. Sothern introduced Lord Dundreary at the Haymarket Theatre, he had already appeared in the character upwards of eight hundred times in the United States. Mr. Pemberton tells us that "the experiment was considered to be a most dangerous one, as it was only because the Haymarket was sadly in need of an attraction, that Sothern got a chance of appearing on its historic boards," and it was stoutly contended that the piece only succeeded in America because it was "a gross and insulting caricature of an English nobleman," and that, therefore, "in London the performance would no doubt be deemed as entirely wanting in humour, taste, and judgment." It is admitted that even Mr. Sothern himself was in a state of uncertainty concerning the probabilities of success or failure. "Every one foretells a hit; but I'm doubtful. Who (when I first played Beverley as an amateur) ever imagined that I should take to the stage as a profession—come over to America, remain nine years, and return to 'star' in London?" All the actors and actresses of the Haymarket Company, Mr. Buckstone included, prophesied a certain failure of both piece and "star," and, oddly enough, they were right for a time, as, although Our American Cousin drew remunerative audiences, it would have been speedily withdrawn had not Mr. Charles Mathews advised Mr. Buckstone not to change the bill. Thereafter the piece ran triumphantly for four hundred nights, and Sothern was the most fêted actor of his generation.

Although, considering that he lived until January 1881, twenty years after the production of Our American Cousin at the Haymarket, it cannot strictly be said that his great triumph as the eccentric "Lord" proved fatal to him, there is no getting away from the fact that the hard life led by Sothern in his hours of success largely contributed to his collapse at the comparatively early age of fifty-five. Among his intimates Sothern will be long remembered for his love of what are known as "practical jokes"; although the reader who fails to "see" many of them may be pardoned his obtuseness, the difficulty being to discover their application. But, apart from the reports of these puerilities, Mr. Pemberton's work is rich in theatrical anecdote, to which we may ourselves contribute a morsel of information. M. Jules Claretie, the present director of the Théâtre Français, wrote, and has republished in his Vie Moderne au Théâtre, a highly appreciative, and excellently expressed, criticism of Sothern's "Lord Dundreary"—a creation which was, however, anything but a success in Paris, although the "star" was supported by Mr. Henry Irving (as the drunken lawyer's clerk, Abel Murcott), Mr. John T. Raymond, and Mr. E. Saker. It is quite possible that the chapters relating to Sothern's life "off the stage" will be more widely read than those immediately connected with his theatrical career, and this although they far too frequently reveal the actor in the character of a buffoon to be quite agreeable to those who would rather remember him as a comedian of rare excellence and exceptional intelligence. We admit, though with a reservation, that Sothern, "before all the actors of his day, was able to portray the easy manners of the perfect English gentleman," but we cannot overlook the fact that very many of the "practical jokes," to which we have referred, savour too much of what would now be regarded, and justly condemned, as "rowdyism" of the most offensive kind. An eminent actor staying in a country-house and tampering with the guests' letters, and getting up rows in trains and omnibuses, may have passed muster even "in society" thirty years ago; but those forms of amusement would hardly, we fear, be tolerated in the year of grace 1889. There is, as we have said, so much that is interesting and worthy of permanent record in Mr. Pemberton's Memoir that the biographer of Sothern might advantageously have omitted much that is of doubtful value—as, for instance, a very great deal of that which is chronicled under the heading of "Sothern in High Spirits."

NEW MUSIC.

SEÑOR ALBENIZ, the distinguished Spanish pianist, whose delicacy of touch and peculiar charm have rapidly won him great popularity, has just published (Ducci & Co.) several characteristic pieces of dance music—"Pavane Espagnole," "Barcarole Catalane," "Sevilliana," and "Bolero Valse"—which can be cordially recommended to drawing-room pianists. They are extremely graceful, and, although showy, not at all difficult. "Printemps et Jeunesse," by E. Rubini, is a light and brilliant valse de salon, and Anton Dvořák's "Minuetto" is delightfully quaint and graceful. As was to be expected from so remarkable a composer, notwithstanding its popular and rather catchy melody, it is throughout very original and striking, and indeed almost, if not quite, classical. Not much can be said for Signor L. Badia's "Zizine," a waltz with a commonplace aria running through it. Among others of Carlo Ducci & Co.'s publications to be heartily praised is an exquisite song by A. Strelezki—"When Twilight Comes"—which is distinctly vocal and the violin obbligato accompaniment most graceful.

From Messrs. J. Curwen & Sons we have received an excellent work entitled "The Child Pianist," by Mrs. Spencer Curwen, which will be found of considerable use for teaching small children. The method is capital, and deserves to be widely known. A pretty light song, with a catchy stornello in the popular Italian style, is "Why?" by Signor del Puente, published by Messrs. Boston & Dibson. It is refreshingly old-fashioned, and seems to belong to the days when Verdi was in his zenith and composers eagerly imitated his tuneful arie and cavatine.

Messrs. Woolhouse have issued a gloomy song by Mr. J. Jacques Hackman, entitled "Afternoon in February." "Feuille d'Album," for violin and piano, by the same composer, is an excellent and easy little study for these instruments. Far above the average, and, indeed, ranking with the best compositions of the time, are "The Song of the Heart," "Echoes," and "To Julia," by Charles Thane (Stanley Lucas & Co.) "To Julia" is a magnificent song, full of originality and charm, and equally beautiful are the two other songs just mentioned. They are perhaps beyond the reach of ordinary amateurs, but to artists they will be found of great value.

Miss Maude Valerie White's last song, "At her Spinning," is decidedly pretty. "Will you come back to me?" by Frank L. Moir, has the misfortune of possessing one of those tiresome waltz-refrains which render it commonplace and quite destroys its merit. Very spirited is a nautical song, by M. Louis Diehl, "The Captain of the Lifeboat." A song which is likely to become popular is "When the Lights are Low," by Gerald M. Lane. The refrain is quite tuneful. An effective ballad is "On Conway Quay," by H. Trotère. "An Evening Melody," by Joseph Barnby, is a simple, unaffected sacred song, suitable for a voice of small compass. It is certainly not original. These pieces are published by W. Morley & Co.

Ricordi & Co. send "Tender Moments," by Signor Albert Visetti, a rather pretty, but by no means striking, song. "Forsaken," by Lord Henry Somerset, is a pathetic aria, spoilt by a series of octaves in accompaniment with the voice. J. L. Roeckel's new song, "Cupid's Reign," deserves success. It is not at all difficult, and has a pleasing melody. "Tell Them," by Signor Tosti, is not one of the composer's most successful works.

Messrs. Ricordi have conceived the admirable idea of publishing a series of well-known operatic Cavatine arranged for the salon or concert-room. Among them we note the beautiful "Come è bello," from Lucrezia Borgia, "Convien partir," "Al dolce guidami," &c. The accompaniments are cleverly rearranged, and the recitatives cut without spoiling the effect. These noble arie, which were the delight of a past generation, ought to be heard more frequently; for they offer the most charming examples of melody known, even if that melody is not always well selected to illustrate the words.

The London Music Publishing Company have just issued a drawing-room cantata by Erskine Allen, entitled, "Mary Margaret," that is not particularly interesting.

A spirited waltz, with a Spanish melody running through it, is "Christina" (Francis Brothers & Day), by Dan Godfrey, Jun. It is destined to become popular; and so, by the way, will "Emma," another waltz by the same young composer.

An excellent edition of Stephen Heller's "Trois Suites" is published by Mr. Edwin Ashdown, of Hanover Square. By the same charming composer are also "Six Préludes" and a series of "Esquisses Posthumes," being sketches and waltzes which all true musicians will welcome cordially. The type is especially clear and bold. A Suite for Piano, by Mr. Edward German, is admirable. The first number is tame and monotonous; but the Valse and Tarantella are brilliant, and not unworthy of comparison with similar works by Chopin and S. Heller.

The violin music now being issued by Messrs. Beal & Co. is excellent, and we can recommend a graceful Cavatina by Mr. Seymour Smith and a quaint Gavotte by Mr. L. Balfour Mather.

A Cavatina by Mr. Seymour Smith is distinctly graceful and original. "Modern Gems" and "Early Blossoms," by Carlo Volti, are easy piano studies which will be found useful in the schoolroom. "Babina," by Mr. Arthur J. McEvoy, is a rather commonplace piece, but it is easy and showy, and will captivate a certain class of amateurs—those, for instance, who perpetuate the memories of the famous—we had almost written notorious—"Prière d'une Vierge." "Rustic Sketches," by Carl Herman, "Sans Pareil" and "Souvenirs Patriotiques," by M. Leonard Gautier, are useful pieces for school-teaching; but they are certainly the reverse of classical in style. "La Vestale," however, is an admirable waltz by the same composer, M. Leonard Gautier. It will surely become popular.

We owe Messrs. Metzler & Co. a debt of gratitude for publishing "Golden Light," a noble song by Georges Bizet. It was, or is, really, an Agnus Dei; but Miss Mary Chater has written some English words, which are quite worthy of so noble a composition, which has a violin, cello, or harp accompaniment. Another fine work is "Chant d'une Bretonne," by Benjamin Godard, a beautiful melody for mezzo-soprano, with quaint French words or equally good ones by Miss Chater, who likewise supplies the excellent translation to the charming "Marquise, vous souvenez-vous" of M. C. Saint-Saëns.

Messrs. Robert Cocks & Co. send "Pick-me-up," a capital brisk polka; "Cosette," by James Shaw, not worthy of publication, and Twelve Exercises of Contralto, by Signor G. Tartaglione, which, although not particularly original, are useful. Mr. M. Watson's "A Garden of Memories" has a worthy refrain, and is a pretty song, which fortunately does not recall the all too popular "Garden of Sleep." "The Windmill," a song by Hugh Temperley, is pretty and original; but it is written a trifle too low for mezzo-soprano, and is not quite suited for contralto.

Messrs. E. Ascherberg & Co. have a bright and characteristic Spanish song by Antonio L. Mora, called "Espanita." "For You" is an arrangement of the well-known song, with a waltz refrain, by Miss May Ostlere, for dancing and singing in chorus—a capital and amusing exercise for children. Six songs by Miss Frances Allitsen display this able young lady's conscientious study of harmony to much advantage. She is a hard-working student; and, although she does not at present give evidence of originality, she is never commonplace or affected.

CHRISTMAS BOOKS.

III.

IT has fallen to Shakspeare, as to other poets, to suffer much of many book-illustrators, but assuredly never to be interpreted by an artist in so strange a way of pedantry as in Macbeth: with Illustrations and Notes, by J. Moyr Smith (Sampson Low & Co.). The illustrative method is not less odd and perverse than the reversal of statue and pedestal or any other freak of topsyturveydom. The antiquarian zeal of Mr. Smith is respectable, we will admit, and the archaic research set forth in the artist's notes is considerable; but industry and research should be the handmaidens, not the masters, of the artist. They cannot compensate for the total lack of imagination and charm that marks Mr. Smith's etchings, in which the chief feature of the design is some detail of costume or architecture. The result is an illustrated archæological study, a dissertation on arms and costume, architecture and heraldry, or anything, in short, but an illustrated Macbeth. Mr. Moyr Smith may be said to have illustrated Macbeth only in the sense that a lecture on the geology of Portland and Purbeck illustrates St. Paul's Cathedral. Very few persons could possibly divine the purport of two-thirds of the plates regarded apart from the context. The archaic display is bewildering. The drama is left to take care of itself. When the figures are not mere pigmies, overpowered by a Martin-like environment of Pictish towers or a Lyceum stage arrangement of curious properties, they are absolutely inexpressive of the passion and action of the drama. Disillusion is not tempered one whit when we learn that Macbeth, with the daggers "stripped for slaughter," as if he were a butcher, stands beside an elaborate wooden doorway such as still exists in Norway, or that Lady Macbeth, in the Sleep-walking scene, appears with a similar setting. The "column from Canterbury Cathedral" in one drawing, the old cross modified after that at Dupplin in another, the carved pillar from Souillac Abbey in yet another, are curious and interesting objects; but they illustrate the drama no more than the writings of Pugin or Viollet-le-Duc. Lady Macbeth is nothing but an operatic lady; the meeting of Duncan and the wounded soldier, the entrance to Macbeth's castle, and Babylonian view of Dunsinane, are spectacular shows of the emptiest kind; and the apparition of the Witches in a Druidic circle, perched on an enormous cromlech, is ineffective as a design and ludicrous in conception. It may interest antiquarian minds to know that in one drawing Mr. Smith's Witches cover over a cauldron "of the later Bronze age," and in another the charmed pot is "Danish, of the later Stone age"; but, after all is said in recognition of the artist's learning and research, the play is the thing, and this is ingeniously set aside by Mr. Smith in this curious example of the art of book-illustration.

Mr. Frank M. Gregory's designs for Sheridan's The Rivals (Sampson Low & Co.) are drawn in black and white and in water-colour. They show a certain amount of grace, facility, and skill in composition, and are for the most part admirably reproduced. The book is got up in good style, both type and paper being excellent, and the ensemble is attractive. The power of characterization undoubtedly possessed by Mr. Gregory is unfortunately not always at his command. He is not careful of his types. When he paints an acceptable rendering of a character, a sprightly Lucy or a whimsical Sir Anthony, he does not fully carry out his conceptions. His Captain Absolute is a mere good-looking boy in one drawing, in others he is a man, and one of many aspects. Lydia Languish is a solid, undemonstrative young woman. Mrs. Malaprop is somewhat tame, and there is more of the humour of the situation than of oozing courage expressed in the figure of Bob Acres in the clever drawing that forms the frontispiece. Success in all particulars is perhaps scarcely to be expected of the artist who undertakes the illustration of a play which everybody knows by heart and must have seen on the stage. We all know these characters of Sheridan as men and women of familiar acquaintance, can call them up at will, and are, therefore, indisposed to accept the least divergence from established conceptions which, after all, are possessed, as prepossessions possibly, by all and sundry. If we cannot say that Mr. Gregory is never disappointing in these drawings, we can also affirm that he interprets the spirit of the play at times with something approaching inspiration.

The magazine annuals make up various attractive volumes. The Woman's World, edited by Oscar Wilde (Cassell & Co.), produces, as some magazines do, a more favourable impression in bulk than when viewed as a serial. Many periodicals for ladies are far too narrow in scope. Mr. Oscar Wilde's shows a tendency to expansion, and expansion that is in the right direction. The letterpress appears to be wholly the work of ladies—Mr. Oscar Browning with a sonnet and the editorial notes on current literature are scarcely to be noted as exceptions from the general rule—and in many fields, literary, artistic, and educational, the writers provide abundance of interesting and varied material. The illustrations are generally good, and those that embellish articles on needlework and its branches are excellent.

The new volume of the Magazine of Art (Cassell & Co.) shows no falling off in the quality of its etchings, photogravures, and other illustrations, while it continues to represent the world of art and its movements by many excellent articles on living artists and criticisms of exhibitions. The frontispiece is an etching after Meissonier by Géry Richard, one of the most finished works of the etcher. Good Words (Isbister & Co.) is too old a favourite with magazine-readers to need any detailed notice of the contents of the new volume; and the like honourable distinction may be said to belong to its friendly and sympathetic competitor, The Sunday Magazine (Isbister & Co.). Among appropriate gift-books the "Jubilee edition" of the History of England (Cassell & Co.) may be included. Of this careful historical epitome we have the third volume, illustrated by wood engravings that are far superior in design and execution to the majority of popular illustrated histories.

In the books for boys at hand the sea is an important element, as is natural, and the resources of writers in devising perils and adventures do not appear to flag, despite the enormous demands of an ever-increasing audience. Mr. Henry Frith, for instance, is never at a loss. When you think his hero is in irrecoverable disaster, wonders thicken and the air grows dark with the complexity of his situation. The Cruise of the Wasp (Routledge & Co.) is one of Mr. Frith's most rousing stories. The adventures of a portion of a ship's crew in Cuba form a striking episode in a story that is told with vivacity and constructed with skill. Another capital story by Mr. Frith, The Captain of Cadets (Griffith, Farran, & Co.), is equally brisk in movement. The scene of adventure is the West Coast of Africa, a region ever-suggestive of marvellous exploits; while in the opening of the story the much-vexed question of fagging on the Britannia is lightly touched. Mr. F. R. Goulding's Marooner's Island (Routledge & Co.) is a sequel to The Young Marooners, and, contrary to the rule, is in no respect less interesting and exciting than the parent work. Readers of the latter must be interested in the fate of Robert and Harold. The story of their further progress and careers will certainly justify the most generous expectations. Mr. Goulding's book is thoroughly wholesome and readable.

A good idea, one that many boys will delight in, is skilfully executed by Mr. William T. Dobson in his abridgment of Sir William Napier's History of the War in the Peninsula (Bickers & Son). This condensed narrative embodies the crises of the great campaigns in Spain and Portugal, the stirring and picturesque description of the memorable battles and sieges, the majority of which form the subjects of some excellent photographic illustrations. We cannot profess to like abstracts of literature, when the literature is of the first class, yet Mr. Dobson's work is so discreet and sound in treatment that it merits commendation. Struggles for National Liberty or Martyrs to Freedom—both titles are on the cover—by the Rev. Philip Barnes (John Hogg) comprises historical sketches of more or less heroic worthies, somewhat promiscuously classed, yet full of good matter for studious small boys. Here are Wallace and Llewellyn, Coligny and William the Silent; "Ireland's romantic young hero," Robert Emmet, cheek by jowl with Sir Harry Vane, and Abraham Lincoln with the fanatic Osawatonic Brown. Heroes and heroes—but heroes all? The Appeal to the Serpent, by the Rev. Samuel Langdon (Religious Tract Society), is a story of Buddhism in an ancient city of Ceylon in the fourth century of the Christian era. As a story the book is not a success. It is loosely constructed, and moves but the faintest interest in its development, and that only incidentally. Mr. Langdon's strength lies in description, not in the arts of narrative plotting. There is much picturesque power in depicting religious rites and processions, rural scenes, and so forth, but the story is sadly wanting in persuasive realism. After Shipwreck, by J. A. Owen (Authors' Co-operative Publishing Co.), is a collection of brief sketches of travel, reminiscences of genuine experience, it would seem, fairly interesting, though by no means exciting. Reprinted from the Leisure Hour are certain tedious and inconclusive papers on "social questions," collected under the title Ways and Means, by Isabella Fyfe Mayo (Religious Tract Society). The book looks like a story. It deals with such exhausting questions, in the way of mere chat between a husband and wife, as What is to become of the girls? and What shall we do with the boys? There is one good anecdote, however, concerning a certain little boy. "What is wrong about your boy?" was asked of the mother of a "peculiar" youth. "Oh, please, sir, when he was a little child, he had an illness, and after that he was weak on his legs, and slow o' speaking; and so, sir, we just brought him up as an idiot, sir."

FRENCH LITERATURE.

WE have already referred, or at least alluded, to the preface which M. Victor Cherbuliez has given to Mlle. de Bovet's Lettres d'Irlande (1), a preface much more gratifying to English vanity than the most elaborate compliments could be. We need not, therefore, further trouble ourselves with the novelist-politician. Mlle. de Bovet herself is a much more amusing person. An "interwieweress" of the République Française, she started to discover Ireland with a light heart, a pleasant pen, a conviction that Mr. Justin McCarthy wrote Ginx's Baby, and (she assures us) no Anglophobia in particular, although, knowing the facts better than Mr. Gladstone, she admits that her countrymen "detest John Bull en bloc." In other words, she went determined to bless Ireland and curse England. Being apparently an intelligent and honest, as well as lively, lady, she found, as might be expected, not a little difficulty in doing this. Nothing is more amusing than the involuntary records of her surprises. She lets loose little asides of wonder at "le spirituel Irlandais" (if you find any Irishman spirituel still, you may bet twenty to one that he is an anti-Parnellite) objecting to her calling him "Paddy," at the mixture of rant and gush in the mouthings of Mr. O'Brien, and the maudlin talk about John Dillon, and so forth. Again and again she has to administer to herself a kind of little "cheerer" of remembrance of English wickedness in order to blind her clear Gallic eyes to the fact that the whole tenants' movement is audacious robbery; that "eviction" is an everyday occurrence in France, or would be if resistance to the law were often thought of; that the sleevelessness and indolence of the Irish character, joined to the insane passion for trying to make two human beings live where there is barely livelihood for one, are the real causes of Irish distress. But she cannot quite do it, and her sense of the truth is constantly peeping through. A more annoying book for an honest and intelligent Gladstonian to read we can hardly imagine, more particularly as it is not the first of its kind to show what the "civilized world" really sees in Ireland when it condescends to look through its civilized eyes, and not through somebody's spectacles.

(1) Lettres d'Irlande. Par Marie Anne de Bovet. Paris: Guillaumin.

M. Edouard Rod (2), though by no means the genius that he has been dubbed by sufferers from Amielism, is a clever man, and usually writes well. We do not know that his stories are particularly "cosmopolitan," but they are in a certain modern manner well done. The opening one, "Lilith," has its scene at Brighton, and the heroine is the English governess of a French family. M. Rod does not oppose his Lilith to Eve at all, but merely makes her "a typical English girl according to Mr. Burne Jones," who enchants an irresolute and somewhat Amielitish juge d'instruction, is perhaps enchanted by him (which doesn't show her taste), but remembers the ghost of a tragically dead love. The juge d'instruction is a very poor creature, though cleaner-minded than M. Bourget's heroes in similar case. Much the same type of person, "moaning about the introspect" (if we may slightly change the Laureate), reappears in "L'idéal de M. Gindre," but the ending is happier, for M. Gindre's American ideal (he is a professeur, and keeps a journal intime, but he is a better fellow and less of a coxcomb than the judge) "tenders him her front" in due course. By the way, did anybody ever know an English or American girl hold out her forehead for a lover's first kiss? Her mouth, her cheeks, her eyes—her throat even, if you like. But the forehead (though it may be taken with advantage in subsequent excursions over the property) is, we think, not usually by our race selected for the first exercise in that amatory kind which the poet calls "the best and most avenant and earnest of the remenant." "Noces d'Or," a shorter story of a satiric touch, is perhaps the best thing in the book, the author's pessimism giving "bite" to his picture of the feeble half-turning of a fifty years' trodden-on matrimonial worm, while it does not degenerate as usual into the morbid or the tedious.

Dernier amour (3), like all M. Ohnet's books, exhibits in a manner very amusing to the critic the author's mixture of incurable commonness in thought, style, and so forth, with a certain undeniable faculty of tale-telling and even of character-drawing. That this mixture is the secret both of his popularity with the general reader and of the rage of the critics with him is undoubted. The situation of Dernier amour is simple enough, if something which is a little disgusting and decidedly preposterous can be called simple. Mina von Schwarzbouurg, the young widow in name of an ancient Austrian Prince, has married (a little later than she should) a charming French Count. Ten years afterwards the charming French Count is still young, and she feels herself ageing. Just then she discovers that he has been in correspondence, unknown to herself, with a still more charming she-cousin of his own—a cousin of America. The correspondence is not criminal, and Lucie Andrimont, the cousin, is an exemplary young person; but the Countess soon perceives that the pair are hopelessly in love with each other. Probably, M. Ohnet's proneness to quasi-dramatic "curtains" and to a rather unwholesome sentimentality being known, few novel-readers will have much difficulty in finishing the story. It is probably in M. Ohnet's intention a very moral story, the catastrophe recompensing Mme. de Fontenay's faute. From this point of view he should go on and show us the Count's punishment, and so on and so on. Poetical justice is no good unless it is all-round justice.

If any one could be bad-blooded enough to speak uncivilly of so good, so pleasant, and so well tried a workman as M. Xavier

Marmier (4), even his bad blood might be a little sweetened by M. Marmier's pleasant application to himself of Voltaire's

Au peu d'esprit que le bonhomme avait, L'esprit des autres par complément servait ;

and his confession that, advancing age not permitting him any longer to travel in the world, he travels in his library. If the result of the voyage is un bon livre de lecture, that is all he aims at. And he has certainly provided such a book, especially for French-reading people who like to have everything that is not France and Paris served up to them accommodé in the way of Paris and of France.

M. Jouaust's charming single-volume edition of the plays of Molière (5) has reached the famous essai pâle et noble, that tragedy-comedy of jealousy in the great world, Dom [or Don] Garcie de Navarre. M. Vitu is, indeed, perhaps spurred on by a generous love of paradox and the generally despised to be much more abundant in praise of Don Garcie than we could be. The jealous megrims of the Don are not taken seriously enough to be tragical and not meant to be purely comic; while the verse—passable enough in its way—would be a sufficient text for those who grudge the greatest of French, perhaps the second of modern, dramatists the title of poet. But still the piece has been so unceasingly run down that it would be hard if a clever man could not defend it. M. Lenoir's frontispiece is very good, and will compare safely with Tony Johannot's cuts; though Don Garcie suited the Romantic tone so well that Johannot was moved to give perhaps the best illustrations to perhaps the worst play.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

TO judge from the supply, there must be a considerable demand for such popular biography as is exemplified in Dr. Japp's Good Men and True (T. Fisher Unwin), a volume of sketches devoted to labourers in various philanthropic fields. Perhaps the lesson of the moral poet is bearing fruit, and everybody, great and small, is for making sublime lives and leaving exemplary footprints behind him. What is most curious to note in connexion with the inordinate multiplication of biographical records is that people never seem to resent the burden of repetition, and, in fact, can never have too much of it. Dr. Japp's book, a good sample of the class, fairly illustrative and interesting, is to a great extent a hash of biographical material already accessible to everybody. Of Bishop Hannington and Charles Kingsley, of Norman Macleod and Guthrie, of the late Dean Stanley and John Conington, there is nothing new to relate. The lives of these eminent men have been set forth by accredited hands and reprinted more than once, the majority of them for the benefit of the multitude. The boiling-down process is excusable, perhaps, when the aim is to provide cheap literature that may compete with cheap dinners. But Dr. Japp's volume is stout and serious. The fare is substantial and made of much solid extract, to use an expressive though contradictory term, and the treatment of the material cannot be said to be light or digestible.

Mrs. Pantan's Nooks and Corners (Ward & Downey) is a book on household management, a handbook for people who have "moved" and desire to furnish and embellish with the best effect. There is much that is admirable in the guidance offered. Mrs. Pantan is a masterful adviser. She knows in all instances precisely what is wanted, is exceedingly full of resource, resolute in laying down the right rule of ornament, or in pointing the royal road to a sound ensemble in the matter of furniture. She does not hesitate to refer by name and address to this eminent firm or another for cheap and necessary articles, and considerably prints a little directory for the use of the young and bewildered. Her exposition is more valuable, on the whole, than the woodcuts that adorn it. "A Summer Corner" (153) is a nook that might be grateful to one hibernating by Orcadian shores; it looks insufferably close, cushioned, and overcurtained. The "Simple mantel drapery" (66) is decidedly simple, but it is also appalling, dismal, funereal; and the "Draped piano" (72) is clothed with Udolphian mystery, and should smite the most indolent Angelina with a fit of energy. But these things are better in the reading. The chapters on domestic economy and management are full of sound and sometimes entertaining advice. But surely the sum of 12*l.* 10*s.* is a paltry allowance in an income of 1,000*l.* a year for "wine, &c.," and 10*l.* for coal is a bitter minimum.

Reports of Artisans selected by the Mansion House Committee (C. F. Roworth), a collection of papers on the leading trades represented at the Paris Exhibition, though not uninteresting on some minor points, is curiously inconclusive on the larger questions of international competition and progress. Many of the reporters lay stress on the difficulty of acquiring trustworthy or important information. They differ widely, too, in their respective views of their mission. Some set to work like workmen; others, like Mr. Lemon, preface a notice of "Boots and Shoes" with a lively account of the Channel passage. Various are the opinions on rent and living for workmen in Paris and London. Mr. Lemon thinks "rents are much cheaper in Paris." Mr. McCrae, who honestly confesses the Exhibition to be "the worst possible place" for acquiring information as to cost and price of articles, says that living and rent are about the same in both places. Mr. Knowles, whose account of "Hatter's Work" is interesting, finds rent "much higher" in Paris, and others join with him in this conclusion. Among the more exhaustive and readable Reports are Mr. Wright's "Clock-making," Mr. Kinggate's "Coach-building," "Bread and Bread-making," by Mr. Summers, and the various sections devoted to Engineering, Cabinet-making, and the Decorative Arts. These are well illustrated by diagrams and other cuts.

There is nothing but the lightest babble, good enough to beguile an hour of railway travelling, in Mr. Alfred Story's Book of Vagrom Men and Vagrant Thoughts (Authors' Co-operative Publishing Company). The sketches of vagrant folk—such as the Tinker, the Carrier, the Street Preacher—are superior to the thoughts they suggest—which, in truth, are generally commonplace. But a certain briskness of movement and facility of expression may engage the voyaging reader. Desultory, yet all undaunted, is the writer's style, and he offers a fair selection of subjects for choice.

Quite the most charming of the smaller forms of Sir Edwin Arnold's popular poem is the new edition of The Light of Asia just issued in the "Lotos" series (Trübner & Co.). The binding is extremely pretty, the paper and type excellent, and the portrait of the author an admirable likeness.

The first part of a comprehensive undertaking by Mr. G. T. Bettany, The World's Religions (Ward, Lock, & Co.), is before us. Religion, no doubt, is susceptible of elastic definition, and no one can complain of illiberal views in this instance. Mr. Bettany's treatment is, of course, popular. His survey of history, myth, and legend deals with the external, is picturesque in the main, and lends itself to the profuse pictorial illustration of rites and ceremonies.

Mr. Edwin Drew offers a study of Mr. Henry Irving from the elocutionist's point of view—Henry Irving, On and Off the Stage (H. J. Drane)—with much elucidative commentary derived from the actor's rendering of Macbeth, Mephistopheles, and so forth, the which is at times too literal an inquisition into accent and gesture to be perfectly intelligible.

The humours of the English schoolboy under the pressure of French examination papers are set forth, not for the first time, we fancy, by Max O'Rell, in John Bull, Junior (Field & Tuer).

An appropriate gift-book for children is the annual volume of Little Wide-Awake, edited by Mrs. Sale Barker (Routledge), with well-varied letterpress and plenty of taking illustrations.

We have received specimens of that admirable collection of guide-books, Illustrated Europe (Zurich: Orell, Füssli, & Co.), issued in French, German, and English, the work of expert writers, the most comprehensive yet concise of handbooks for tourists in Germany, Switzerland, the Tyrol, and Italy. Cheapness and utility were never more satisfactorily allied. The illustrations are numerous and good, the maps convenient, the information accurate, varied, and valuable.

We have also received new editions of Mr. W. J. Courthope's Addison, "English Men of Letters" series (Macmillan & Co.); the first volume of Mrs. Browning's Poetical Works, with a steel engraving after Hayter's portrait (Smith, Elder, & Co.), the edition to be completed in six volumes, uniform with the last collected edition of Mr. Browning's works; The Roman and the Teuton, by Charles Kingsley (Macmillan); A Modern Telemachus and Bye-Words, by Miss Yonge (Macmillan).

In the article "New Books and Reprints" which appeared in the Saturday Review of October 26, p. 476, "Amoy Mission" was misprinted "Army Mission," and "Christ or Confucius, Which?" appeared as "Church or Confession, Which?" The actual title will explain and justify the epithet "objectionable."

THE

By G. A. AITKEN.

WITH NUMEROUS PORTRAITS.

"A remarkable instance of what may be accomplished by industry and perseverance. The work has cost its author many years of labour and research, and the time has certainly not been misspent. The writer's style is clear and pleasant, his narrative of events is scrupulously impartial, and we are confident that all who are interested in the history of that epoch will be grateful to Mr. Aitken for this valuable contribution to our knowledge of Steele, his contemporaries, and his times."—Athenæum.

"Rarely, indeed, has a work of biography issued from the press showing a greater desire for accurate information on all points left previously in doubt, or a better good fortune in obtaining the facts which had eluded the search of earlier inquirers. . . . It will be a difficult task for any subsequent labourer to glean from the fields which his latest biographer has passed through."—Academy.

"The careful student will not find, we believe, anything wanting in this Life which it was possible for the most painstaking research to discover. . . . To know all about Steele that can be known, he must go to Mr. Aitken."—Spectator.

"Every chapter, every page even, is sown with the traces of patient investigation. It will remain that, in a plain and unaffected style, Mr. Aitken has written a biography of Richard Steele which is unsurpassed for its exhaustive collection of material and for its patient pertinacity of inquiry."—Saturday Review.

"One of the most companionable books of our time. The genial presence of the author makes the atmosphere of the book fresh and fragrant; and to learn to know her as we know her here is to enrich life with a new delight. These volumes are pleasant to look at and to handle, and are beautifully printed."—Academy.

"It is simply one of the most charming pictures of still life that has appeared for a long time."—Standard.

"It is a book to take away the fear of life, which is more common than many people imagine. Many who have no fear of death, dread old age. They are tired of battle and burden; they are afraid that courage and endurance will not hold out. These two lived within sight of a hundred, and the calmest and most golden of their days seem to have come latest."—British Weekly.

ALPHABETICAL INDEX OF TOWNS, VILLAGES, &c.

"We have already commented on the pains which appear to have been taken to work up the maps to the latest dates; we may add that they are excellent specimens of engraving and colouring, that the great difficulty of marking mountain ranges, &c., without obscuring the names, has been excellently surmounted, and that we have detected very few misprints.

As what may be called a medium atlas for general use, something between the cheap but meagre school collections and the elaborate but rather costly and unwieldy library atlases, the 'London Atlas' deserves hearty recommendation."—Saturday Review, on the First Edition.

NOTICE. — A SECOND EDITION of "THE PARIAH," 3 vols., by the Author of "Vice Versa," "The Giant's Robe," "A Fallen Idol," &c., is now ready at the Libraries.

PRESS OPINIONS OF "THE PARIAH."

"In 'The Pariah' we are more than ever struck by the sharp intuitive perception and the satirical balancing of judgment which make the author's writing such extremely entertaining reading. There is not a dull page—we might say, not a dull sentence—in it. The girls are delightfully drawn, especially the bewitching Margot and the childish Lettice. Nothing that polish and finish, cleverness, humour, wit and sarcasm can give is left out."

"'The Pariah' will certainly add to Mr. Anstey's reputation. In it he for the first time puts his peculiar gifts of observation and analysis to an entirely serious use. Here we have tragedy pure and simple, designed with great originality, and worked out with extraordinary insight and skill."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"As a study in social life one rarely finds anything so good or so well founded upon a knowledge of human nature."—Glasgow Herald.

"An ingenious and incisive study of certain phases and products of English caste."—Scotsman.

SIR EDWARD GUINNESS'S GIFT.

FOR some considerable time past the housing of the poor has been what a sentence-maker of former generations might have called the problem of the wise, the amusement of the foolish, and the capital of the political agitator. We have had Royal Commissions on it, Blue-books on it, honest talk and writing on it not a little, and dishonest talk and writing on it to an enormous extent. Sir EDWARD GUINNESS, in the magnificent gift which was announced on Wednesday, is not the first who has attempted to help towards its solution on the simple dead-lift principle; but he is the latest, which is more to the point. His selection of London and Dublin for the fields of his bounty is well made; for causes over which nobody has any control have made London the worst, and causes over which the interested agitators of Ireland have much control have probably made Dublin the next worst, examples of the evil. His selection of trustees is excellent. Lord ROWTON was the trusted friend of the first English Prime Minister who ever interested himself in such things, as Sybil shows. Mr. RITCHIE is the most efficient member of Parliament who has ever been returned by a constituency made up largely of such persons as Sir EDWARD desires to benefit. Mr. PLUNKET has performed the functions of First Commissioner of Works, which are closely connected with the business in hand, with less fuss and more sense than almost any of his predecessors. All belong to the political party which flatters the people least and has done most for it. And such instructions as the donor's general scheme gives are eminently sensible instructions, directing them to aim at benefiting as low a class as can be got at, and a much lower class than has been got at yet.

It is impossible to wish more good to the new scheme than we do, and if we proceed to set out cautions rather than encouragements, it is only because our goodwill is sincere. It may be taken as granted by common consent that previous efforts in this kind have been very partially successful; but the causes of their ill success have been too numerous, too various, and sometimes too problematical, to serve as absolutely clear sea-marks and lighthouses to the GUINNESS Trustees. One rock, however, is very clear. They, too, as of reason, are to reinvest the rents of the houses, as the PEABODY Trustees were. They will have to be careful not to fix those rents too high, in order to obtain a larger sum for reinvestment. But the rock of almshouse is almost as clear as the rock of over-rent, or the rock of good-dividend-paying investment; and it may be hoped that all three will be avoided without difficulty. There are much subtler troubles with which Lord ROWTON and his colleagues will have to contend. Trustees of their class have always been tempted to extirpate rookeries, with, as far as can be seen, the almost invariable result that the rooks are only driven off to make some other colony ten times blacker. It has constantly happened that, when the buildings have been built and fitted, instead of a class rising from below to take advantage of them, a class—taking advantage in a different sense—has settled on them from just above. It is at least open to question whether the cité system, the plan of enormous barracks subdivided into flats and apartments, is the only plan available, or the best plan in itself, or the plan most suited to English tastes and requirements. And then there is the last infirmity, an infirmity with which we are loth to find fault, and which demands that artistic merit shall be consulted—a demand not, it is true, met hitherto with any marked success, but the attempt to meet which has undoubtedly resulted in no small expenditure of money. Shall the Trustees fix on the middle of London and pay vast sums for their ground? or go to the outskirts, and thereby add to that existing determination of blood from the heart which not unreasonably disturbs some good men, and to the time wasted in getting to and from work? Shall they try and elevate their clients by the provision of costly fads in fitting or not?

All these questions, and many more, are sure to press themselves on the Trustees, and there will not be lacking innumerable advisers to give them most confident, and not seldom most interested, if not interesting, advice on each. For our parts, we shall offer them scarcely more than a little story, which happens to be, in the main, true. Once upon a time—so long ago that the Chairman of the Eighty Club the other night, to whom Mr. MORLEY confided the remark of his "cynical friend" that "a man must drink too much of something," was probably anticipating the remark by committing excesses with the more harmless kind of Bottle—there was a young man who had lodgings, the landlord of which was a kind of waterside character. And one night the landlord's daughter knocked at the lodger's door, and said, "Sir, father is out of tobacco, and if he might make so bold, could you lend him a pipeful?" And the young man (who was young and foolish) took a pouch of a cunning mixture which was made by Mr. BRYANT, of Oriel Street, and a cake of golden-leaf wrapped in silver-foil, and a tin of what Mr. THACKERAY somewhat generously calls "rich Latakia," and other tobacco-nalian fantasies, and piled them in the maiden's apron, and returned to his own pipe and the works of (probably, for we are not sure) Mr. SWINBURNE. And shortly afterwards there was another knock, and the damsel returned with the lapful untouched, and said, rather timidly and blushing:—"Please, sir, father's much obliged, but if you had some Richmond shag!" Which little story we commend to Lord ROWTON, to Mr. RITCHIE, and to Mr. PLUNKET, for the moral thereof is exceedingly apposite. Let them find out by diligent inquiry what that lower class which Sir EDWARD GUINNESS desires to benefit wants and likes, and give them that, a little (not too much) better than they can now get it, at a fairer price, and with the opportunity (not the enforced partaking) of something better still. Let them, in particular, inquire very narrowly whether the barrack system is suited to the tastes of their probable clients, and whether it is necessary in the interests, not of large rent collection, but of fairly economical management of their capital. Model laundries, and model kitchens, and model bath-houses, and model this and that and the other, are capital things, if you can get them used, and if they do not cost too much. But there are a great many people who will not use them, and then those people must be more highly rented or kept out altogether, that others may have the use. Well-built, well-ventilated rooms, plain solid fireplaces, sufficient sanitary appliances, and plenty of water, together with perhaps a cookshop somewhere in the block of building, where wholesome food can be sold at a paying price, and the rest left to the household to perform for itself, are likely to do far more good than faddish phalansteries or great barracks full of the latest scientific and mechanical gimcracks. We are not ourselves at all sure that a considerable part of the money might not be spent on common lodging-houses—of the ordinary type, but better—with immense advantage. This is, of course, going dead against all the cant of the day, all the desires of those who would buy (and, to do them justice, sometimes sell) sovereigns for fifteen shillings, all the impossible aspirations of those who think that the lowest class of a great community which has multiplied out of all proportion can be furnished at nobody's expense with leisure and comfort equal to that of the lowest class of small communities which have not nearly approached the limit of their means of subsistence. This can never be done. What can be done, and what such gifts as Sir EDWARD GUINNESS's give the opportunity of doing, on a scale relatively small, but positively large, is to provide a fair amount of decent comfort, or rather the opportunity of comfort, in the most economical and sensible way, without any middle profits, with a certainty of inspection enough to keep things straight and not enough to interfere with self-help, and, above all, with due and direct regard to what the people really want, what they are fitted to enjoy, what suits, in the good old words now so much forgotten, "that state of life" in which they are and not that in which they are not.

QUEER DUELS.

IT is a pity, as Mr. FOKER said on a celebrated occasion, that the clergy should interfere in affairs of honour. M. EUGÈNE VEUILLOT is not exactly a clergyman, but he is the editor of a religious paper, and occupies a position more or less clerical. But in him the journalist overcrows the man of piety and peace, and he has published an article in which a Bishop is accused of plagiarism. It is a crime easy to prove, but almost impossible to commit; nor need we wonder that the Bishop's nephew, Lieutenant PAIMBLANT, did not tamely acquiesce. No process appears more safe than attacking the literary character of a gentleman who is a bishop, and cannot call you out; who is dead, and cannot excommunicate you. But the late prelate, Monsignor LAVAL, left a nephew, a man of war, and the nephew took up the blood-feud. He went, in company with a brother officer, to the office of the Univers; and here, even according to his own version, he did not behave according to the rules. You cannot be too polite to an enemy whom you propose to shoot or to pink. M. PAIMBLANT was not polite. He asked for the name of the blackguard who had reviewed his uncle's book, and here, we think, it will be allowed that he made a mistake, insulting the person to whom he spoke and the Univers at large. M. VEUILLOT replied by a set of tu quoques, returned the mud which the Lieutenant had thrown, and shied some more which he had not. M. VEUILLOT is no longer in his first youth, and M. PAIMBLANT declined to strike him; but was it more in accordance with the rules to rub his nose in a sheet of his newspaper? "Then began a murder grim and great," as KINGSLEY was fond of saying. The editor got hold of the poker, and poor M. DE COLOMB, the friend of M. PAIMBLANT, got "the redder's stroke."

No good ever comes, as JEAMES says, in Pendennis, from being mixed up in an altercation. The end of the struggle, as is common in such brawls, was unsatisfactory. The editor said he would go on reviewing the late Bishop, for whom every one will feel sincere sympathy; for a bishop may blunder, but we cannot believe that he would plagiarize. M. PAIMBLANT said that he would kick the editor round his office; but he did not do it, and departed under a shower of Billingsgate, in which a clerical journalist ought not to be proficient. And there has been no duel, after all. This is just what comes of neglecting the decorum of the duello. Had M. PAIMBLANT respectfully asked for the name of his uncle's reviewer, perhaps M. VEUILLOT would not have used unseemly language, but would have gone on the ground like a gentleman, and shot at the Lieutenant "with the saw-handled one he was used to." Duelling exists for the very purpose of checking violent language and the arbitrary use of pokers. M. PAIMBLANT, apparently, did well to be angry; for it is the business of a nephew to defend the reputation of a priest who cannot take care of himself, and of the dead against whom it is proverbially wrong to bring charges of plagiarism. But, if we fought in England about that matter, how busy some novelists and some newspaper moralists would be! M. VEUILLOT seems to have the worse of the affair in general opinion, and it is certain that he began it, and in his clerical journal set a very bad example of Christian manners.

The duel of the American Colonels, if we can call it a duel, is a much more serious and melancholy business. Colonels GOODLOE and SWOPE, gentlemen of Kentucky, had long been on bad terms. Six years have passed since Colonel GOODLOE tried to get Colonel SWOPE turned out of his place in the Internal Revenue. Other political and personal differences had estranged these gallant sons of Kentucky, and it was a cruel freak of fortune that allotted to them neighbouring boxes in the post-office at Lexington. They met as they were taking out their letters, and they might only have scowled at each other if they had not chanced to be armed. If one institution is less laudable than another in America, it is the practice of carrying concealed weapons, revolvers and knives. When men wore swords they sometimes met "on an occasion," as Sir WILLIAM HOPE has it, in The Scots Fencing Master, lugged out their irons, and fell to foining without seconds or decency. But a duel "on an occasion" with rapiers admits of all the delicacy of the art, need not be fatal, is not savage, and affords a spectacle of the highest interest to the amateur. Besides, nobody can be hurt except the combatants. Now, no amateur could be pleased, nor feel any sensation except of disgust, at the really butcherly affray between the two Colonels. The intrepid SWOPE had a revolver, and the advantage seemed all on his side. There are some who argue that, in a duel across a handkerchief, between a swordsman and a man with a pistol, the chances are equal. The pistolman may parry the sword-thrust, but in doing so he is likely to derange his aim, and miss. Colonel SWOPE did miss, although at close quarters, in the excitement of the moment. The bullet went through the post-office window, but nobody got in the way of it. Colonel GOODLOE had now got his knife out, and began to hew Colonel SWOPE "in pieces sma'," like the lover of HELEN of fair Kirkconnel Lea. But Colonel SWOPE did not blench; he fired his pistol into the other Colonel's person. Colonel GOODLOE held his ground; probably Colonel SWOPE's pistol was of insufficient calibre. It is a vulgar error to carry any lighter artillery than a navy revolver, if a man must carry a revolver at all. The owner of the knife renewed his murderous onslaught, and Colonel SWOPE fell, and died. His opponent survived him by only a few hours.

If there be a thoroughly wrong and bad way of settling a dispute, it is this fashion, which we had hoped was almost obsolete. Men may cut each other, and abuse each other's character, as we do, or they may go through a well-regulated private war, like most Continental peoples. But to hack each other to death with knives, to shoot at sight, is neither civilized nor worthy of gentlemen, and is most inconvenient to the majority of citizens. Colonels GOODLOE and SWOPE might have met in Holmgang, and fought it out, with axes if they liked, on any island in the river. This would have been archaic and picturesque; while an exchange of shots at twenty-five yards would have restored tranquillity of mind, and perhaps done nobody much harm. But rumpuses with pokers, revolvers, hunting-knives, and so forth, do not give decent satisfaction, are clumsy, inartistic, and unworthy of any society which is higher than mere brawling anarchy. Nobody but the Americans of a few States misbehaves in this ferocious way, which combines the maximum of homicide with a minus quantity of chivalrous entertainment. Whatever may be said against duelling, it is a noble institution compared with unregulated butchery. But this savagery will not die out while men are permitted to carry concealed arms.

MR. MORLEY AT HOME AND NOT AT HOME.

MR. JOHN MORLEY seldom speaks better than when he is in that state on which SYDNEY SMITH congratulated Miss GEORGINA HARCOURT—the state of "having her society hot and strong, and undiluted by laity and dissenters." Before a hostile or divided audience he is not nearly so happy as when nobody is present but the faithful. Accordingly, his address to the Rump of the Eighty Club, on Tuesday night, was a very good performance of its kind—confident and flowing, and with a pretty rhetorical peroration about the joy of passing away like a shadow and leaving generous memories behind you. The "generosity" of Mr. MORLEY's party, perhaps, is of what we have ventured to call here the Tupmannic, or vicarious, kind; but no matter for that. Mr. MORLEY is scarcely ever excited (though we have a dim memory of an exceptional address to some picnicking miners at Blyth) by such an occasion to the boisterous cock-a-hoopness of some of his present associates. But it has been observed of the ancients that, the more pleasantly and cheerfully after-dinner oratory, even of the less boisterous kind, runs, the less is it apt to stand the uncomfortable examination of breakfast-time. Mr. MORLEY's speech, we fear, is scarcely an exception to this rule. For instance, it is generally known that there have been and are searchings of heart among the advanced Gladstonians as to Mr. MORLEY's attitude on the Eight Hours question. Why Mr. MORLEY should have selected this particular last ditch to die or live in nobody knows. An Eight Hours Bill would, indeed, be a preposterous thing enough; but it would not be in the least degree more preposterous than plenty of other things which he has swallowed with a good grace—nay, has eagerly reached for and tossed off with gusto. Probably, however, Mr. MORLEY is of the opinion of those comfortable doctors who have held that, if you stick fast to one or more points of belief, if you perpetually deny yourself one or more indulgences, and so forth, you acquire thereby full Christian or unchristian liberty in all things else. At least this is the only reason which we have been able to imagine for this curious selection of "The Crown and No Eight Hours Bill" for his battle-cry.

He is not, however, very well served on this point either by his own arguments or by those of his friends. The chief Gladstonian morning newspaper, for instance, after hinting in a rather gingerly way that it agrees with Mr. MORLEY, observes that "It is a somewhat paradoxical position that the War Office should not be allowed to engage the men at Woolwich for nine hours a day, although every workman on the premises was desirous of occupying himself for that period." No doubt it is; and more than paradoxical. But it happens to be a proposition practically identical with that on which the Irish friends of Gladstonians act every day of their lives. Mr. MORLEY himself "would as soon" put trades "under military discipline" as consent to a Secretary of State fixing maximum hours of labour because a majority of men in the trade demand it, or preventing workmen by the stroke of his pen from working beyond that time. So would we, and a great deal sooner. It is, indeed, grand to find Mr. MORLEY thundering against the tyranny of the majority, and pleading the right of the individual to work as he pleases. But, good heavens! what wild work do these thunderbolts make with the established and accepted principles of his own party! A majority—a "transient majority," says Mr. MORLEY, holding his breath with horror. For a rank, highflying, fire-new Tory commend us to the member for Newcastle. Certainly it is a most horrible thing that a majority—a "transient majority"—a majority "ascertained by a poll or what not" (fresh blasphemy!)—should be allowed to dictate in such a manner. But what a hideous hum do we seem to hear from the sacred principles and the theories and doctrines which Mr. MORLEY is supposed to accept. For this last theory of his cuts them all away. Never can we have Disestablishment, for we never can be sure that the majority is not transient. Never can we have local option; never one-man-one-vote; never nothing. In fact, the only institution that will stand Mr. MORLEY's new test is—we almost shudder to mention it—the House of Lords itself. There the majority is not transient—at least, so we understand its enemies to complain—there you need not have "a poll or what not" to ascertain it. It has that character of fixity which we now learn to be Mr. MORLEY's one political ideal, and which, no doubt, accounts for his steadiness in monarchical principles.

A similar flimsiness (if we may, without impoliteness, drop sarcasm, and therefore speak plainly) characterized Mr. MORLEY's speech throughout. He thinks it a sufficient answer to Lord SALISBURY's plain statement of fact that the disease of Ireland is a want of respect for the sacredness of contract to say that Lord SALISBURY passed a Relief Act in 1887. We can hardly pay Mr. MORLEY's intellect so bad a compliment as to suppose that he did not recognize his own paralogism. Perhaps the strongest, and certainly not the least often repeated, argument against the legislation of 1881 was precisely this, that it would not merely render probable, but would necessitate, constant revisions, in its own sense, until or unless it was repealed in toto. The carrying out of such revisions as a part of Ministerial duty implies no approval of the original legislation. And then let us take that wonderful argument of Mr. MORLEY's about the rating of vacant land. Mr. MORLEY knows of land in Kensington which has a selling value of four hundred thousand pounds and is rated at sixty-two pounds. This may be fact or it may be fiction; we do not care which it is. For what Mr. MORLEY's contention comes to is this, that a man is to be rated, not on the value of his property according to the use to which it is actually put, but on the value which certain persons choose to say might attach to it if he either got rid of it altogether or used it in some other way. So be it; we will take Mr. MORLEY a little further along his own road. He is an excellent journalist and man of letters, and for several years he has let this talent of his lie in a napkin, or has used it only to the production of one little book. This is monstrous. If he had worked only eight hours a day during that period at books and articles, he would have had a taxable income many hundreds, if not thousands, higher than that on which he has actually paid Income-tax. He has left the field unimproved, unbuilt on; and we say, in his own words, "In no country but ours, with the popular franchise, would such a state of things be tolerated."

What is doubtless pedantically termed reductio ad absurdum is the best way of dealing with Mr. MORLEY, because he is himself nothing if not an example of what, with equal pedantry, is called the intellectus sibi permissus. We have less interest than most people in arguing that people who have read and who can write are not good politicians; but Mr. MORLEY certainly himself affords a remarkable example in support of this old doctrine or prejudice. He seldom makes a speech without showing either the painful effort of a man who is trying to make the policy which has been forced upon him as a practical politician square with the principles which he has adopted as a theoretical one, or else a deficient grasp of practical politics themselves. If by practice his hand is a little subdued to what it works in, if he is less careful than he used to be to make logic and leading, principles and practice agree, he has not given up the attempt, he is only more careless of the gaps between the pairs. He would hardly a very few years ago have left that monstrous rift about the transient majority without at least an attempt to patch it. "Now his nerves are grown firmer, Rift he leaves it and utters no murmur." Yet even this comes short of the practice of the really practical politician, such as Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, who never, and Mr. GLADSTONE, who scarcely ever, attempts a logical argument at all. No doubt Mr. MORLEY is, in a sense, valuable to his party; it is an old observation that such a party will give almost anything for a character, and, though it will not give so much for a reputation when the reputation is merely literary and intellectual, it will give something for that when it is sufficiently out of pocket in these respects. But when there is a considerable, and apparently an increasing, fraction of it which cares neither for intellect, nor for literature, nor for character, the politician who has only these particular wares to sell must feel uncomfortable about his future market. Is Mr. MORLEY prepared to deal in certain very different commodities?

LONDON LEASEHOLDS.

THE institution of County Councils, and more particularly of the County Council for London, has been followed by a flaming revival of all sorts of discussion about land allotments, free education, free dinners, the "liquor traffic," the leasing of house property, and various other questions of a similar character. No doubt these questions, or most of them, were debated long before the Councils were established; but they have become much more lively since, and for a very obvious reason. State interference operating over the whole country in matters like these is a great thing to ask for; it could hardly apply with sufficient discrimination, considering the wide difference of conditions in one place and another; and there still exists a general repugnance to State control in affairs of everyday life. But if such questions can be referred to the decision of elective Councils, and made dependent on the will of a majority of ratepayers in this or that well-defined district, where all the facts are easily ascertainable, there seems to be much less likelihood of error and a great reduction of the element of compulsion. That is the explanation, no doubt; and in all likelihood the Legislature will be more and more pressed to confer on District Councils a power of interference in affairs social and economical which it would hesitate to exercise on its own account and for the country at large. It would be easy to show that between the objections to the one and the other kind of interference there is not so much to choose as seems to be imagined by many; but that is not our business on the present occasion. We have to remark on a new demand for limiting freedom of contract where house property is concerned, though it would be quite as reasonable to extend the demand to contracts for the sale and purchase of sugar, cotton, corn, copper, or any other trade commodity.

The agitation of which we speak has been raised on behalf of the tenant-tradesmen of London; and some of them seem to have started an Association for the furtherance of their desires. As we understand their complaint, it is this. It often happens, when a tenant-tradesman's lease expires, that his landlord refuses to enter on a new bargain without raising the rent, or without insisting on costly repairs, amounting in some cases to rebuilding. The rebuilding stipulation is not a common one, but the demand for a greatly enhanced rent is; and it is often made when whatever additional value the house may have for business purposes has been conferred by the personal skill, energy, and enterprize of the tenant. By the exercise of these qualities, in himself alone residing, a something called "good-will" has been created, which is worth money, and which the landlord sells to somebody else for his own benefit if the tenant who created it refuses to surrender its equivalent in the shape of increased rent. That, we understand, is the greatest grievance of all. Now it may be conceded at once that the case of such a tenant, in the hands of such a landlord, has a look of hardship on the face of it. We take it, however, that it is a comparatively rare case; that is to say, it is a comparatively rare thing in London (and it is London we are dealing with) that the enhanced value of shop or factory is due to the business merits of the tenant alone, and not in some measure to general competition for house-tenancy, or in great measure to that and to a particular "improvement of the neighbourhood" besides. But, to deal with this worst grievance first, is it as serious as it is alleged to be, and what is the remedy for it whether it be small or great? In the uncommon case put by the President of the Tenant-Tradesmen's National Union—the case in which "the improved value of the premises has been created solely by the industry, business tact, and capital of the tenant, through years of anxious toil"—it seems hard that he should be called upon to turn out or make the improved value over to the landlord by payment of a "premium" or a higher rent. It is not a singular hardship; there are others like it to which the landlord is constantly exposed; but a hardship we may allow it to be. But a hardship is not always a grievance. Call this a grievance, however; and then let us see how it originated, and what is the better means of doing away with it. It originated in the terms of the original contract entered into with the landlord; as to which two things are to be observed. In the first place, it was a voluntary contract; neither party was forced into it by the other. In the next place, it was made in full knowledge that what has happened might happen; indeed, it would be strange if the tenant did not look forward from the beginning to the making of a good business—i.e. the creation of a valuable "good-will." But he contented himself (so it appears from the case assumed) with a bargain which terminated his use of the house at the end of so many years; well knowing that, no matter how or in what measure its value might be enhanced in the interval, he would have to make a new bargain for the tenancy, or give it up at the termination of his lease. Surely the grievance fades very much when we look at it in this light. The tenant might have made his bargain (with one landlord, if not with another) for forty years instead of for fourteen or twenty-one; or he might have stipulated for a continuation lease, at will, on certain terms. If this cannot be done in one street, it can in the next; and we must remember that in the case assumed the increased value of the house is due entirely to the business faculties of the tenant, and not to any advantage of "position." The cure for the hardship under consideration seems to be, then, greater care and the acceptance of a little more risk in making the original bargain. It is certainly more reasonable to call upon the tenant for that, than for the tenant to insist upon a court of inquiry to determine whether the whole of the increased value of the house at the end of his term of holding, or whether any and what part of it, is mere saleable good-will, and to compel the landlord to re-let the house to the same tenant for the same business for so long a time and on such conditions as it thinks fit. But that is what the Tenant-Tradesmen's Union demands, apparently; and it is all the more unreasonable on this account: though during the first term of tenancy little or nothing may have been added to the value of the house by tenant competition or improvement of the neighbourhood, who is to say that the landlord's anticipation of enhanced value from these causes in the immediate future may not be just?

And, should it be realized, why should he be deprived of an advantage which certainly belongs to him more clearly than to anybody else? He has to take the risk of depreciation, which may occur after an interval of increased value in which he has no share of advantage.

So far, however, we have been dealing with extreme and comparatively rare cases of hardship—if hardship is precisely the right word for it. But it does not appear that the discontented London tradesman confines his complaint to woes of this kind. We all know that when rents are raised at the expiration of a lease-term, in by far the greater number of cases it is because the value of the house has been increased by competition depending on a general improvement of trade and its profits, and (or) by some particular improvement of house property in the immediate neighbourhood. In London there are districts which have "gone down"; but, on the whole, the value of house property for all purposes has been steadily going up for generations. Therefore, as most leases come to an end rent rises; and, as a consequence, the number of people who are called upon to pay enhanced rents is very large indeed. None like to do so; and thus we have a formidable body of malcontents. But the malcontents should be reasonable; and there is no reason in claiming what does not belong to them, or any part of it. Even supposing that the increased values are of the nature of "unearned increment," it is no property of theirs; while in enormous numbers of cases it is the property of the landlord by the particular title of having paid an excess price for the chance of appreciation. In any case, the enhanced value cannot be claimed by the tenant; though, as a matter of fact, he has had the benefit of it for some time before the termination of his lease. This must be so in every case where a higher rent can be got in the market at the end of his term of holding as a consequence of competition for such property in his neighbourhood. This benefit seems to be put out of account altogether. There is no consideration, or no fair consideration, of the fact that for years the landlord has been a loser, the tenant a gainer, by the terms of contract between them; and that fact being put aside, the tenant then comes in and claims the right to another contract by which the one shall be a loser and the other a gainer still. Moreover, it seems that the Tenant-Tradesmen's Union hopes to force the Legislature to assist the operation. That endeavour they will fail in, we take it. But, of course, the London tenant-tradesmen can form themselves into a combination like those which artisans set up, and for similar purposes; if so, however, they must look for a Landlords' and Houseowners' Union to keep up rents where the rival association would put them down.

THE BENCH AND THE BULLET.

THE murderous attack upon Judge BRISTOWE at the Nottingham station, last Tuesday, once more illustrates, probably to no purpose, the curse of free-trade in pistols to which we have called such frequent attention. The accident to Mr. Justice DAY, happily slight, will have no effect upon the most reckless driving of hansoms round the sharpest corners. The injuries inflicted upon Judge BRISTOWE, unhappily serious, will leave the liberty of unlicensed firearms where they found it. The time has gone by when the sufferings of important personages led to social reforms, and SYDNEY SMITH could no longer say, even with plausibility, that the burning of a bishop would unlock the doors of a carriage. The only hope is that some day a drunken or mischievous idiot may shoot himself with his own revolver. Most miscreants, and even many fools, are extremely careful of their own skins. Men who regard everything else with contempt regard the abrasion of the cuticle with alarm, and dynamite outrages, if we remember rightly, abruptly ceased when two eminent dynamiters blew themselves up instead of blowing up London Bridge. That every one who carries a revolver in the streets of London, or any other civilized town, may receive a painful, but not deadly, wound from his own weapon must be the cordial wish of every peaceable citizen. With the exception of Montenegro, and the Western States of North America, England is perhaps the most unrestricted mart of lethal tools. If Judge BRISTOWE were a police magistrate, we should have more hope for the future. County Court judges have in England no criminal jurisdiction, and they do not therefore enjoy the opportunity, which in the present painful circumstances they would eagerly embrace, of adding months or years, as the case may be, to the sentence of every convict who was in possession of firearms at the moment of his arrest. We exhort magistrates who have criminal jurisdiction to remember, in the first place, that even a County Court judge is a fellow-creature, and, in the second place, that the next victim may be one of themselves. Indeed, their immunity up to this hour, and the safety of those more exalted functionaries who wear ermine, may be only due to the fact that they have never been called upon to deal professionally with a German vendor of artificial teeth, whose bite is worse than his bark. We are conventionally supposed to be a civilized, tranquil, and cultivated people. We have abundance of free libraries, and no conscription. Yet one of the most difficult things to buy in London is a book, and one of the easiest is a revolver.

The wicked and cowardly assault upon Judge BRISTOWE, a man nearly seventy years of age, excites universal sympathy. Mr. BRISTOWE was well known for many years on the Midland Circuit and in the House of Commons. Everybody liked him, for he was pleasant to everybody. It appears from what was said before the magistrates on Wednesday that Mr. BRISTOWE remained on the Bench what he had been in the House and at the Bar. Such an abominable crime as the attempt to kill him is a disgrace to the country, and the Town Clerk of Nottingham might well express satisfaction that ARNEMANN is not an Englishman. But the real discredit which flows from such offences belongs to the law which permits them. ARNEMANN, with his pistol, walked without let or hindrance on to the station platform, and calmly shot Judge BRISTOWE as the Judge was entering the train. It may not be always possible or convenient to keep persons with no ostensible business from congregating round departing trains. ARNEMANN was not even a stranger. He practised his trade in Nottingham; he had been fined, at the instance of the British Dental Association, for describing himself as a dentist, without possessing the proper qualification; and he may therefore be assumed to have borne an indifferent character. Moreover, he had been heard to say that he could not get justice in the County Court—meaning, apparently, that if he supplied a customer with teeth which did not fit, the Judge would not make the customer pay for them. This man had no difficulty in buying a pistol, waiting for the Judge in a public place, and shooting him down without interference from any one. If ARNEMANN, of whose perfect sanity there seems to be no doubt whatever, had asked for a pistol to shoot Judge BRISTOWE, he would not have been supplied with it. The only precaution he found it necessary to take was not to mention his design in so many words.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON ON CRETE.

WE suggested recently that it would be desirable for some Minister to put the truth about Crete a little more elaborately before the public. The challenge was taken up by Sir JAMES FERGUSSON at Dartford last Monday. Sir JAMES, of course, knows the facts better than any Cabinet Minister except Lord SALISBURY; but with the intelligent public his name does not carry the weight of a Cabinet Minister, and with the intelligent newspaper editor he has not the chance of being reported at equal length with one. As good a report as any appeared—with creditable fairness, though for some reason or other a day late—in the newspaper which has made itself the chief mouth-piece of attacks on SHAKIR Pasha, and to which Sir JAMES FERGUSSON directly referred. Also the Daily News has attempted to defend itself against the UNDER-SECRETARY. We are glad to see that it distinctly disclaims "holding Lord SALISBURY responsible for the proceedings of MOUSSA Bey." But it would have been better if it had not, like Captain O'BRIEN in his celebrated despatch, "mixed up" Crete and Armenia quite so much; and it would have been better still if it had not attempted to reassert in definite form the indefinite as far as not disproved and trumpery, and disproved or trumpery as far as definite, assertions of its Canea Correspondent. The fact is that there never was an "indictment" so cut to ribbons and torn to rags as the indictment of that Correspondent has been; and this would be equally the fact if, at last and after all, actually substantiated charges of actual "outrage" in Crete were to be brought.

It is, however, sometimes held, we do not know whether wisely or unwisely, that exposition of truth is more powerful for good than refutation of falsehood. It is certain that the public, whether again wisely or unwisely we give no opinion, attaches to the positive narration of a responsible Minister weight which it rarely attaches to statements in a newspaper. Therefore, though there will be little indeed in Sir JAMES FERGUSSON's account of Cretan affairs which will be new to readers of the Saturday Review, we are glad to welcome it. That Crete, instead of being at the mercy of a Turkish Vali, has an exceedingly democratic Constitution; that the Cretans acted on the "sound democratic principle" (as fervent democrats have called it) of the spoils to the victors; that the minority, as minorities are apt to do, objected; that both majority and minority were Christians, and that the disappointed Christian minority, in true schoolboy fashion, attempted to "pass it on" by murdering the Turkish soldiers who represented the governor who constitutionally supported the Christian majority, are things no doubt quite unknown, and very surprising to the Baptist ministers, but perfectly true. That these pious Christians then found no means of restoring their own fraternal affection to a proper warmth except by combining to fall upon their Mussulman neighbours is again indubitable, and it should not be surprising to Baptists, from their knowledge of the way in which Dissenting sects, though they get on marvellous ill together, sometimes show their Christian charity by combined attacks on others. That the Turks, as peace-keepers of this Home-ruled island, had to put things straight, that some rough work may have taken place, that this roughness has been vastly exaggerated, and so forth, are also things which may possibly find credence now that they are vouched for by a responsible official. We only hope they will, but with a hope which is not extremely confident. The article of which Sir JAMES fell foul, if it had any meaning at all, exhorted the Mahomedan subjects of the Porte to rebel against the Porte, thereby abandoning the "Christian" pretext altogether. To go from Crete to Armenia, Señor CASTELAR, in his well-known exaggeration of VICTOR HUGO's silliest style, has just been remarking, "Servia exists, Roumania exists, and so does Bulgaria. Why should not Armenia revive?" One might give the eminent Spaniard several reasons, but doubtless they would do no good. And we really do not know that Sir JAMES FERGUSSON's facts will do much good either to the actual believers in Cretan atrocities. To those who, by much repetition, might have come to believe they may do good; and so they are welcome.

IRELAND.

WE doubt whether any deliberate satirist of the Irish character, from Mr. THACKERAY downwards, has ever hit upon quite so rich an illustration of its comic perversity as has been supplied by the letter in which Archbishop CROKE has enclosed to the Freeman's Journal his subscription of 50*l.* to the Tenants' Defence Association. The right reverend prelate is careful to point out that before making this contribution he had satisfied himself of the legitimacy of its object. Distinguished members of the Irish Parliamentary party had so clearly indicated the lines and laid down the basis of the new organization, that no reasonable doubt could be entertained as to either. "It is to be conducted," says the Archbishop, "on purely legal and constitutional lines, and it is to be built on the solid basis of cash in hand and of national credit." Its purpose, Dr. CROKE goes on to explain, is to enable them to carry on the war against "a nest and network of bad landlords," who are "armed to the teeth and in a twofold fashion." And the manner of their twofold arming is this; that "they have money, however got, in their pockets, and the law of the land at their back." Hence, to face them successfully, "we also," continues the Archbishop, "must provide ourselves with cash, and be, moreover, in a position to defy, while defeating, the law." Surely no finer specimen of a characteristic Irish product has ever been exhibited than this. "To what green altar, O mysterious priest, lead'st thou that most magnificent of bulls—a League of Tenants 'defying and defeating the law' on 'purely legal and constitutional lines'?" But Dr. CROKE goes on to show how this feat is to be performed. "By 'subscribing to the funds of the Tenants' Defence Association we shall be at least equal to our adversaries in the "first—that is, the financial point—and we can bid defiance to the law in the second place, by taking right good care on no account [archiepiscopal italics] to break it." Here, then, comes another fine horned animal, "lowing at the skies," and we are left contemplating the delightful puzzle of a law which is to be legally and constitutionally defied and defeated without being broken.

From the conclusion, however, of this wonderful letter we are able to gather some idea of what we may call the unconscious meaning of this professional director of consciences. When he recommends a legal and constitutional defiance of a law which is on no account to be broken, what he really advises is that this law should be on no account broken in such a way as to expose the lawbreaker to the certainty of legal punishment. He exhorts the people of Tipperary not to be "tempted into any rash or equivocal courses"; meaning thereby such courses as the administrators of the law will find no difficulty in putting a stop to by sharp methods of punishment. He reminds them of O'CONNELL's motto, that "He who commits a crime gives strength to the enemy," and adds, "Let it be ours also." All which of course is, in a certain sense, plain enough. What is meant is, "Don't break the Sixth Commandment, because you are likely to be caught and punished for doing so; and, even if you were not, the thing would make a scandal; but break the Eighth Commandment, in a quiet way, as much as you like, which if you do discreetly, you will be exposed to nothing more than the civil consequence of eviction, against the resulting inconveniences of which I am now assisting to guarantee you by a subscription of 50*l.* to the funds of the Tenants' Association." This is the plain English into which Archbishop CROKE's Irish translates itself. When he admits that the landlords have the law at their back, he, in effect, admits that the tenants who are withholding their rents are keeping back money which is legally and morally the property of their landlords; and when he recommends them to keep this money in their pockets, or, as will more probably happen, to hand it over to third parties, to confiscate as much of it as they think fit, he is simply advising them to break the Eighth Commandment on "legal and constitutional lines." When an Archbishop's notions of elementary ethics are as defective as this, it would be as useless as it might be thought presumptuous to argue with him. We can only wonder how he manages to reconcile his conduct with other and more strictly professional canons. If an Irish prelate does not know right from wrong, he might be presumed not to be ignorant of what the Head of the Church has laid down on the subject, or be incapable of perceiving that that ruling unequivocally condemns his present action. For Archbishop CROKE must know perfectly well that, unless the Tenants' Defence Association were intended to be worked on the principles, as nearly as may be, of the Plan of Campaign, and supported, as far as its supporters can manage to do so, by the same methods, it would have no reason of being. And he cannot need to be reminded of what has been said about "id belli genus quod audit the 'Plan of Campaign' et ea interdictionis forma quæ 'boycotting' nuncupatur."

There is, however, not much difficulty in understanding why this letter should be made public just at this moment. The Archbishop says in his letter that he has been in doubt whether he should subscribe at once or defer his contribution, but that he had "settled down to the conclusion" that "to give quickly is to give twice." Let us add that it is often advisable for a person in Dr. CROKE's position to give quickly in order to induce other people to give even as much as once; and we entertain very little doubt that this last matter has weighed as much with the Archbishop as any. By all accounts the progress which the promoters of the Tenants' Defence League have made with their enterprise thus far has by no means come up to their expectations. The zeal of the farmers in the cause is of a far less ardent description than Mr. O'BRIEN and his friends had anticipated, or, at any rate, had pretended to anticipate, and the subscriptions, instead of pouring into the coffers of the Association in daily increasing volume, are dribbling into them in a disappointingly slow and scanty fashion. The truth of course is that the Tipperary tenants, who are in a fairly prosperous condition, and have had no trouble with their landlords, can with difficulty be got to acknowledge their obligation to involve themselves in a quarrel, still less to expose themselves to the risk of eviction for the mere sake of assisting tenants in other parts of Ireland to plunder their landlords of their rent. In Kerry, where the land war was not unknown before, the organizers of the movement may possibly have a little better success, though the proceedings at the Convention held the other day at Tralee, to, as it was called, "inaugurate" the Association, seems to have been itself favoured with but doubtful auguries. This meeting, which was attended by some half a dozen Irish members of Parliament, refused to admit a police shorthand writer to its deliberations, but was not destined, as the event proved, to maintain any very rigid rules of exclusion. Its proceedings, the report goes on to say, were for the most part orderly, but on more than one occasion the speaking was interrupted owing to the attempts of the people outside to gain admission. "After a time the door was forced in, and the meeting eventually became a public one"—as apt a mode of effecting the transformation, perhaps, as could readily have been devised. Resolutions were then passed pledging the meeting to promote the extension of the Association in Kerry and levying a tax of threepence in the pound for the support of the organization. It is one thing, however, to levy a tax and another to collect it; and unless the tenant-farmers of Kerry display more enthusiasm for the cause than those of Tipperary, the new League is hardly likely to realize the expectations with which it was started.

At the last fortnightly meeting of the National League in Dublin Mr. HEALY, who presided, made a somewhat noticeable speech in vindication of the course taken by him as counsel for certain of the Maryborough prisoners. He did not enter, he said, upon this statement on his own behalf, but in the interest of his colleagues, who had been unfairly attacked in various newspapers. This is very self-denying on Mr. HEALY's part, since, as it happens, there is no one who has been more vehemently attacked, in at least one Parnellite newspaper, than himself. It had been said, he observed, that the action of counsel for defence "should have been to expose the entire system of trial at Maryborough"; but he did not know who entertained that idea. His own idea was that the first duty of counsel was to his clients, whose lives and liberties were involved; and, considering the number of "stand-bys" the Crown could command and the few challenges, especially in the misdemeanour cases, where there were only six allowed on the part of the prisoners, he believed he had taken the wisest course. This, no doubt, is very plausible, and it may possibly serve its purpose with those to whom it is intended as a reply. But, considering that one "packed" jury had already disagreed on their verdict in the case of one of the prisoners, the fact that Mr. HEALY declined even to try his luck with the other juries, who could hardly have been more "packed" than the one referred to, is a pretty good indication of the clearness of the case against those prisoners whom he and his colleagues advised to plead guilty. It is to Mr. HEALY's credit as an advocate, at any rate, that, though he is ready enough in his capacity of political agitator to swell the ridiculous cry about the unfairness of the trials, he takes care not to sacrifice the interests of clients whom he well knows to be guilty to the temptations of party demonstration, but, on the contrary, foregoes an opportunity for such a display, in order to make the best bargain with justice for them that he can.

THE RELIEF OF EMIN PASHA.

IT would appear from Captain, now Major, WISSMANN's despatches that the Germans will, after all, have the pleasure of being the immediate welcomers of EMIN Pasha and Mr. STANLEY at Mpapwa, and afterwards at Bagamoyo. Captain WISSMANN, who has contrived to inspire persons who know nothing of him personally with much respect of late, and who deserves his promotion, admits, "with a frankness which I'm sure must charm ye" (and how terrible is the thought that the author of those words not so very many years ago is the author of a certain set of Scotch speeches this week), that the refugees would have made for Mombassa if they could. Nor is it necessary for him to say that one of the reasons which have made the route to Mombassa unavailable is the semi-filibustering of the late, or not late, Dr. PETERS. Everybody must hope that there will be none of those slips which so often happen between the cup and the lip in the last stage of EMIN Pasha's journey to civilization. As for Mr. STANLEY, he has secured at least a very eager audience for the account which he will have to give of himself. We shall all read with interest the history of his imminent deadly scapes, and the account of the discoveries to which he has sacrificed so much. And some of us will look with an interest even greater for his justification of the steps which have turned out so disastrously. It may be taken now as certain that, if Mr. STANLEY, postponing other considerations to the simple execution of his business, had made his way to the lakes by the same road on which he has now made it from them, EMIN would have been reached years ago, the disaster of the Yambuya force would have been avoided, the Upper Congo would not have been the prey of Tippo Tib, and, at least possibly, EMIN would not have been drawn away from his threatened frontier. With Mr. STANLEY, too, returns the one man, Mr. BONNY, who can tell us something direct of the rear-guard on the Aruwihimi; and soon after Mr. STANLEY opens his lips the lips of another eyewitness, Mr. ROSE TROUP, whatever their utterance may be worth, will also be unsealed. We shall be very happy if the result of the combined testimony so long kept back is favourable to Mr. STANLEY. But at present, in the hope of his approaching safety, and in presence of the unceasing puffery which a certain portion of the press lavishes upon this very courageous pressman, it is just as well to point out, first, that Mr. STANLEY has not really succeeded in his object, for everything seems to show that EMIN could have come away in this fashion long ago; secondly, that he has to account for having squandered the lives of several brave Englishmen as a direct result of his adoption of the Congo route and his bargains with Tippo Tib.

All the despatches which have been recently received bear, as we should expect, the mark of Mr. STANLEY's hand, and not of EMIN's; and it seems that they may have been a little doctored in transmission. It will be of the highest interest to hear what the doughty opponent of Mahdism has to say as to the circumstances which suddenly turned his victorious resistance to barbarism into a helpless rout, and obliterated the last traces of civilized rule on the Equator. His misfortune must have happened while Mr. STANLEY was first summoning him southwards to the Albert Nyanza, and then making wild-goose chases backwards and forwards between the shore of the lake and that rearguard which should have been needless if he could trust his representatives on the Congo, and must have been exposed to the danger which actually befell it if he could not. But, however this may be, it is quite evident that serious steps will have to be taken in this part of Africa, and not in this part only. Unless the despatches received are more than ordinarily confused, Mahdist pursuit must have, though unsuccessfully, followed the refugees far south of any district where Mahdism was previously believed to exist. At the other end of the lake district the slave-traders and the Portuguese, either in concert or separately, are making a somewhat similar difficulty. Between the two the Germans, as yet quite "correctly" and with due regard to agreements, are working pretty vigorously, and it behoves Englishmen not to be left behind. If there are any sucking CLIVES about, the British South African and the British East African Companies might do worse than keep an eye on the tops of the steeples of Market Drayton and other likely places.

M. TIRARD'S PROGRAMME.

THE proof of the pudding which M. TIRARD has just presented to the Chamber of Deputies will lie in the eating. On cursory inspection there is no apparent reason why it should not prove when put to the test very reasonable good diet. There is a good deal of froth about it; but then it is of a kind which is acceptable and need do no harm. When M. FLOQUET, who is not in the Ministry to be sure, but who speaks with it and for it, says that a ray of the fraternity of '89 has gone out from the Exhibition all over Europe, he is indulging in one of those sonorous and empty phrases the French love. It would be idle, indeed, to expect that Frenchmen will understand how little the "fraternity" which invites them to perpetual interference with their neighbours' affairs is acceptable to others. When M. TIRARD talks of the "hospitality" extended by France to other nations during the late successful bazaar, he will probably, nay, certainly, be listened to with grave approval by his countrymen. To them it appears quite natural to talk about the hospitality shown in charging visitors to Paris one or two hundred per cent. more than the usual prices for lodgings and dinner. All this, however, is mere sauce and trimmings which do not affect the substance of the meal. The PRIME MINISTER's speech has been criticized at home on more serious grounds. Complaints have been made that it only says what the Ministry will do, but not what it will not do. The passion of the French for sonorous phrases is hardly stronger than the love of some of them for what they call les situations nettes. The Moderate Republicans and many of the Conservatives would like to have the Ministry make a formal declaration of its intention not to submit to the dictation of the Radicals, not to countenance any scheme of Revision, and not to indulge in any more anti-Clericalism. If they could get these assurances, they feel that they would have the inexpressible happiness of knowing exactly where they are. Without them they never can be quite certain that M. TIRARD will not spring a new Revision scheme on them, or begin once more to worry the Church.

This desire for security is very natural, but it may be doubted whether anything would be gained by mere assurances from M. TIRARD. The only real security lies in the steadiness and good sense of the Opportunists. It is true that their display of these virtues is tardy, but we doubt whether their continuance in the path of virtue would be promoted by a compulsory public recantation. On the other hand, something might be lost by a too great explicitness of language. The Radicals have been to some extent cowed by the result of the general election. They are prepared to join in a policy of conciliation, which will not mean a mere policy of surrender to themselves on the part of all other Republicans. As long as they remain in that frame of mind, it would be a loss rather than a gain if they are provoked into active opposition. The Moderate Republicans, who are prepared to overlook and forget a good deal in order to bring about a coalition between themselves and the reconcilable Conservatives, may profitably practise a similar policy with the Radicals. An agreement on the part of the majority of the Chamber to let questions of policy on which they are certain to quarrel alone for the present, and devote themselves to the business the Ministry asks them to discuss, is the best, the only, chance of avoiding a return to the wrangling and instability of recent Sessions. We do not hope with much confidence for a continuance of wisdom on the part of the deputies; but we are sure that a general agreement to let sleeping dogs lie affords them their only trustworthy course. For the moment a majority of the Conservatives are prepared to work with, or at least not to hamper, any tolerable Conservative Ministry, and the Radicals are subdued. It is at least possible that, if the Chamber devotes itself to business, this pacification may endure for a time. The business which the Ministry asks the Chamber to deal with has called for thorough treatment for a long time. It is nothing less than the very disordered state of the finances. With a growing floating Debt, and expenses, ordinary and extraordinary, which it seems impossible to reduce, the Budget of the richest country on the Continent of Europe has been for years past approximating to the condition of that of Spain. If the difficulty is not to grow to unmanageable proportions, a serious and honest effort must be made to deal with it at once. M. TIRARD's Ministry has at least the merit of pointing out what is to be done. As for the hints he gives—they are nothing more—of the way in which his Cabinet proposes to go to work, it is early to attempt to criticize them. It will be necessary to see the Ministry's measures. The general lines, as M. TIRARD gives them, do not look very hopeful. He and his colleagues seem to wish to do incompatible things. They promise to relieve at least some classes of the taxpayers, while they make what looks like a promise of further outlay on education, and an increase of the already excessive expenditure on public works. The reduction of a large floating Debt and establishment of an equilibrium between revenue and expenditure will, however, certainly not be attained without either a great increase of taxation or very serious reduction of charges. The Ministry promises neither of these strong measures as yet. When the Chamber comes to the actual discussion of business, it will have an opportunity of proving the soundness of its good resolutions by boldly facing one or other of these unpleasant necessities. In the meantime the abolition of the match monopoly before it is at all clear how the loss its suppression will entail is to be made good, has much the air of a sign that the Chamber is more disposed to welcome the pleasant work of remission of taxes than the disagreeable necessity for the imposition of new ones.

THE THIRD PARTY.

THERE is a familiar anecdote of a candidate for the Bar who, being asked to give some account of a "common vouchee" and his place in the legal economy, replied that, at the conclusion of the plaintiff's case, the defendant took the common vouchee out of Court and impaled him. To keep the third party out of Court lest he should be impaled is rapidly becoming one of the chief ends of modern jurisprudence. The idea that counsel may bring the third party into Court and "impale" him, as if he were an ordinary witness, shocks the delicate susceptibilities of judges and barristers. This may be in some respects a very pleasing and beautiful, as it is certainly a very novel, state of things. It contrasts in a strange, not to say a startling, manner with those rough old practices which filled the sentimental novelist with abhorrence. The unfortunate third party, when he was only a witness, had to be examined, and even cross-examined, at length and with freedom. It is true that the style of the Ancient Bailey has long disappeared from forensic manners. If Mr. WINKLE could be induced to re-enter the box, from which he so precipitately fled, he would no longer be questioned on the hypothesis that his natural taste for perjury would lead him to begin by giving a false name. Very few counsel now rise to commence their cross-examination with a look of pain and disgust at being compelled to breathe the same air with the polluted wretch who has been called by the other side. An advocate of sense and tact knows that in such circumstances the sympathies of the public, including the jury, are against him. For cross-examination is not popular, and probably never will be. Every one who has heard Sir HENRY JAMES perform the unpopular act must recognize that courtesy is quite consistent with the most consummate dexterity and the most unsparing thoroughness. But, after all, the primary object of legal proceedings is to elicit the truth, and not to spare the reputation of Lord This or Mr. That. The irrelevant introduction of scandalous matter is a social crime, as well as a professional error. Happily the discipline of the Bar and the vigilance of the Bench have hitherto sufficed to prevent, or to punish, the gross abuse of a counsel's privilege. But, as Lord PALMERSTON said in his brief and famous note to Lord JOHN RUSSELL, "there is a limit to all things." The limit of one thing seems to have been reached when a criminal case is withdrawn, and a civil case tried in private, because disclosures might be made which would damage people "not before the Court." Every one is "before the Court" if facts which he knows, or which concern him, are essential to the proper administration of justice.

We referred last week to the case of MALAN v. YOUNG, which affects, or is supposed to affect, the reputation of Sherborne School. Two parents have since written to the Times to say that, as the truth is to be concealed, they shall remove their sons from the school. Who can say that they are wrong? A third paterfamilias does, indeed, contribute a slashing response, and says that he, for his part, shall wait until the judge has decided the issues between plaintiff and defendant. How does this gentleman know what the issues are? If Mr. Justice DENMAN's judgment is published, we fail to see how the precious feelings of the third party will be saved. If it is not, nobody will be any wiser at the termination of the suit than he is now. The mere fact that the plaintiff or the defendant has succeeded will throw no light upon the condition of Sherborne or upon anything else, except, perhaps, the fitness of Mr. YOUNG to remain at his post. On Tuesday last a certain Mrs. BLOMFIELD MOORE appeared at the Central Criminal Court to answer a charge of having libelled a certain Mr. CHANDOR. What the libel was we neither remember nor care. What really concerns the public is the reason which the prosecuting counsel gave for withdrawing from the case, which, strictly speaking, he had no right to do without the permission of the Recorder. "The libels," said Mr. GILL, "are contained in letters which are very long; the defendant has pleaded not guilty and a justification, and this plea would involve the bringing forward of ladies and gentlemen who have nothing to do with the matter, and who are perfectly innocent parties [sic] whose names ought not to be mixed up in such a matter." When a man prosecutes a woman, or indeed when any one person prosecutes any other, he cannot without culpable rashness assume that the party charged will plead guilty. He ought to be prepared to prove his case. No doubt the plaintiff in a civil action may desist from pursuing it at any moment, subject to considerations of costs. But the criminal law is not meant to be played with, and invoked or abandoned according as "ladies and gentlemen" may or may not be involved. Mr. POLAND, as counsel for the defendant, at once said that Mrs. MOORE would have proved the accuracy of everything she wrote, and the prosecutor's explanation may have been a mere excuse. Whatever it may have been, however, it was at once accepted by Sir THOMAS CHAMBERS as the most natural thing in the world. Of the darker and more terrible consequences which may result from sparing "third parties," it would at present be premature to speak.

THE STRIKES.

THE widely-spread trade dispute over wages, which is the inevitable outcome of good times and a rise in prices, shows no sign of coming to a speedy end. When it is quieted in one place it breaks out in another. The bakers' strike has been averted by the quickest and most effectual of all means—the surrender of the masters. This by itself may be taken to be a complete justification of the action of the men. It is to be presumed that master bakers, like other men of business, would not give in to a demand for increased wages without resistance if they did not know they could do so without incurring excessive loss. We must, therefore, suppose that the London bakers have been making profits of late years which leave them an available margin. It is a supposition which is far from rash. There is another explanation of the speedy settlement, and it is this—that the master bakers feel confident of their ability to recoup themselves for any loss they may have suffered by increasing the price of their bread. A rise of a halfpenny per loaf is already talked of in some parts, at least, of London. We have no producible evidence that this decision of the master bakers is not quite reasonable. The trade is one which has a reputation for looking sharply after its own interests, but here as elsewhere competition probably keeps prices down. Bakers may in some parts of London, if not in all, find that the new scale of wages will put them in the dilemma of either raising their prices or losing their money. In that case, the course they will take may be easily guessed. For the rest, if the public thinks, as we are told it does, that all men have a right to moderate hours and good wages, the public must be prepared to help by paying good prices. You cannot raise the price of production without also raising the price of the product. The third course, which is to compel some capitalists to work at a loss for the satisfaction of the public conscience, has not yet been openly suggested as practical.

If this simple business rule were only well kept in mind, it would be easy to remove the grievances of the London omnibus and tramway men. All that is required to put them right is that the public should give up its preference for paying a penny rather than twopence for a bus fare. It is only extreme ignorance or dishonesty which can make people blind to the fact that the great fall in omnibus fares within the last few years must have been made good to the Companies somehow. The particular "how" seems to have been found in cutting down the working expenses, which of course means long hours and low wages for drivers and conductors. The London Road Car Company does not, we venture to assert with confidence, wish to be killed in a war of rates with the London General Omnibus Company. That is what will happen to it if it is compelled to increase its working expenses. Sir CHARLES RUSSELL, and other sympathetic orators, would be better employed in stating that case than in talking platitudes to the men about their right to this, that, and the other, without regard to whether they can get it. We need not say how much better such instruction to their congregations would become reverend gentlemen than declarations at strike meetings that "they would have no mercy on ratters." At the present moment, indeed, what seems to call for remedy as pressingly as the grievances of workmen (who are mostly well able to look after themselves) is the growing disposition of their advisers, professional and amateur, to use them as a whetstone for their own particular axes. A very pretty list might be made of these friends of the workmen and their doings. Sir CHARLES RUSSELL would be there with his confession that he does not understand the question, and his incitement to the Road Car men to strike. The Rev. H. B. CHAPMAN, burning with love for his brothers on the tram-cars, and consumed with a zeal (which has eaten up the good man's discretion) against ratters, might keep him company. More notable than either of them is Lord BRASSEY, who might, for the souls' good of all three, read with comment his pitiable letter of the 19th to the Lightermen's Joint Committee of Conciliation. Never did a poor gentleman have to confess to so much wobbling in so short a time. His lordship has to confess that he gave diametrically contradictory interpretations of the "one job one night's work" rule, and that "matters cannot be left where" he did his best to put them. In this he is right, and the interested parties are making a new settlement unincumbered by his lordship's assistance. To these persons might be added the professionals of the Dockers' Strike Committee, who are now engaged in a rough-and-tumble with a rival body on the south of the river to decide which is CODLIN and which SHORT. It has happened, also, to this honourable body to be required to be reminded from Australia, and pretty sharply too, that money sent over for the dockers' families must not be divided among English Unions to further the ends of the Strike Committee. We do not know that it is very creditable that the only set-off to all the wordy sympathy, the puzzle-headed bungling, the incitement to violence, the suppressions of the truth, and suggestions of the false, which are to be found in the proceedings of these persons, should be the good sense which Mr. W. H. SMITH has addressed to the workmen from Exeter. Mr. SMITH, who is as sympathetic as any of them, does not think his sympathy is an excuse for blinking facts. The misfortune is that so many others have held back, and left the field to the mischief-makers.

GLADSTONIANS ON THE STUMP.

THE Gladstonians, as is natural of course with the "Outs," contrive, as a rule, to keep the barrel-organ of platform controversy going a little longer than their adversaries. What is more, they frequently, to do them justice, make a shift to grind harder than ever when they see their rival in act to sling up his instrument on his back. They have managed, for instance, to bring this week to a close with quite a little festival of stump oratory in the provinces. On Thursday night—fancy, on one night alone!—we had three such performers as Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, Mr. FOWLER, and Mr. STANSFELD all speaking at once, not to the same audience, but to public meetings at Hanley, at Stoke, and at Taunton. Here be attractions indeed; an ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer, a former Secretary to the Treasury, and a whilom President of the Local Government Board, all discoursing at the same time—all of them on the same subject, and two of the three in precisely the same way.

It is unnecessary, of course, to say which was the exceptional third, the orator whose mode of treating his subject is peculiar to himself and immutable. It was, of course, Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT who delivered himself at Hanley as one of the pleading patrons of that great Liberal demonstration in the Potteries which was presided over at Stoke by Mr. FOWLER. Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, it will be seen at a glance by those (for there are such persons) who endeavour to form an idea of the effect of his speeches without reading them, was in good form at Hanley. That is to say, he appears to have been so, upon a cursory survey of the interjected exclamations of his audience—and it is remarkable how much time may be saved, and how little of solid political instruction is lost, by confining the attention solely to this feature in the reports of Sir WILLIAM's speeches—but, though his discourse to the potters was punctuated more liberally than ever with "cheers," "loud cheers," "laughter," "great laughter," and so forth, its reception, when a little more closely looked into, suggests one or two questions of a rather puzzling nature. The applause here and there seems not to have been—how shall we put it? not exactly serious; while, as to the mirth of Sir WILLIAM's hearers, it actually inspires here and there the awful suspicion that it was indulged in, not sympathetically with the eminent comedian, but at the eminent comedian's expense. Sometimes it seems to have been aroused—and this is particularly awkward—by passages which the eminent comedian manifestly intended to be as grave as pomposity could make them. What, for instance, is the meaning of this? "There ought to be 'a provision that, when a working-man changes his place 'of residence, he should not lose his vote. (Laughter.) 'Above all, I have spoken in favour of the principle of 'one man one vote. (Laughter.) There is another subject which is of special interest in this district, and 'that is mining royalties. (Laughter.)" Now it appears to us—though we advance the opinion with the diffidence which should distinguish all statements on an obscure subject—that Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT was not joking here. Yet his hearers not only laughed at the notion of his having views on the reform of registration, and on the plural vote, but actually ridiculed—and in that presence—the reference to "royalties." All might, of course, be accidental; audiences often have private jokes of their own; but when, a little further on, we find that, on Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT's exclaiming, in reference to the Conservatives and Liberal Unionists, "Let them fuse," a voice in the crowd interjected the ill-chosen phrase, "Let them stew," we must confess to an uneasy suspicion that among a certain portion, at any rate, of the Hanley audience there was a disposition to "guy" the distinguished orator and statesman who was addressing them.

In this résumé of Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT's speech, we believe that we have not passed over anything of importance which is to be found in it. Whatever of serious argument or reasoned defence of the Gladstonian policy it contains, we feel pretty sure that we have already done full justice to. But it not infrequently happens that the personal part of Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT's speeches are more interesting than his weightier political utterances; and this is peculiarly true of the speech of last Thursday night, which he commenced by thanking the potters for the indulgent reception which they had given that night to a "servant who endeavoured 'to serve his country'; and observing that "he knew 'that the cordiality with which he had been received 'was due to the fact that he had not been unfaithful to the party to which it is his pride to belong, 'and the chief whom it is his honour to serve." Observe the true modesty of the man in not adding to the words "party" and "chief" the word principles. Of course it is implied. Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT is the last man to take credit to himself on such a personal devotion to a party leader as to follow him when he deserted the convictions of his lifetime, and abandoned the cause to which he had pledged his allegiance about once a year probably on an average for the earlier half-century of his political life. Sir WILLIAM, we say, is quite incapable of such apostasy as that out of mere romantic devotion to any particular statesman—or, at any rate, to any particular party leader, if the word statesman be too wide. We do not for a moment believe that that was the motive which prompted him to follow Mr. GLADSTONE in his flight to the camp of Mr. PARNELL. Therefore, while Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT has taken credit to himself "for his fidelity to 'the chief whom it is his honour to serve," he must have meant his audience to add for themselves the qualifying words, "so long, of course, as, and always providing that, 'his chief remains true to his own principles and those 'of his party." And, since this was so obviously to be understood, Sir WILLIAM, as we have said, deserves the praise of the highest modesty and self-denial for having left "principles" as completely out of the question as Lady TEAZLE advised the elder Mr. SURFACE to do with the word honour.

Mr. FOWLER and Mr. STANSFELD contributed fully as much to the one special topic of controversy to which they confine themselves—except when it suits them to complain of Unionists doing the same thing—as did Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT. The former, it is true, made a slight and perfunctory attempt to work in the social question with that of Ireland; but the latter, as becomes a politician who has actually paid a recent visit to that country—talked of Ireland, and Ireland alone. And from the manner of his talking, we should not be surprised if one of the most intrepid of his companions on the Front Opposition Bench—we do not refer to Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT—found himself matched with a formidable rival. Mr. STANSFELD said that "he had been in Ireland, and that in his speeches 'he made up his mind not to say in Ireland what he had 'not said in England; and the result was that Mr. BALFOUR 'did not venture to apply to English members the same 'administration of the law as he applied to Irish members." This is a little mysterious at the first blush. Why should Mr. BALFOUR imprison Mr. STANSFELD for "not saying in 'Ireland what he had not said in England"? Even the Crimes Act, according to the views of its severest critics, has refrained from "creating an offence" out of "not saying something." We suppose Mr. STANSFELD to mean that he said all the terrible things about Mr. BALFOUR in Ireland that he had said of him in England, but these only; and, if these were very terrible, as we daresay they were, though we cannot pretend to remember them, Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE will have to look to his laurels. Meantime, if Mr. STANSFELD, and, for that matter, Gladstonians generally, would resolve "not to say" in England what they have said before in England, the public would owe them a debt of gratitude.

MR. GILLIES'S ANSWER.

THE answer which the Hon. DUNCAN GILLIES has sent to Sir HENRY PARKES's proposal that a Congress should be held to discuss a scheme of Federation for Australia does not materially forward a solution. The Premier of Victoria has, in fact, produced a counter-suggestion of his own, which may well be made an excuse for further debate. When Sir HENRY PARKES was asked to join the other colonies in arranging a scheme for common defence, he eluded the invitation by proposing that all the colonies should proceed to discuss the much larger question of Federation in a Congress nominated ad hoc. To this Mr. GILLIES replies by saying that he does not see the need of any such special appointment. He thinks that the existing Federal Council, in which New South Wales takes no part, could perfectly well represent the other colonies, even if Federation is to be discussed. New South Wales could send delegates to this body, and then the Congress, if there must be a Congress, would be duly constituted. But the Victorian Premier is clearly of opinion that it is unnecessary to discuss so much. He says that the matter in hand is much smaller than Federation. It is nothing more than the establishment of some working scheme for combining the defensive powers of the colonies. Mr. GILLIES is as eager as any man for Federation. He is even, as he rather wickedly hints, under the impression that he has already shown more zeal in the good work than Sir HENRY PARKES. At least, we gather so much from his little dig about the former occasion on which New South Wales put its hand to the plough, and then drew back. At present he seems a little suspicious that Sir HENRY PARKES's eagerness to get his hand on the plough again is inspired by a desire to drive the furrow in his own way. If so trivial an expression may be permitted about things and persons of so much dignity, he rather pooh-poohs Sir HENRY PARKES's doubts whether the Australian Federation Act empowers the colonies to provide themselves with a common fighting force. There is not, so he tells the Premier of New South Wales, any question of the establishment of a great army. That has not come up, and is not likely to come up for many years yet. All that is required is some simple working scheme by which the militia of one colony could be made in case of need to act with the militia of another under the officer seconded for service in Australia.

On the face of it there seems to be a good deal of force in Mr. GILLIES's contention. As he justly puts it, the hypothesis is that the colonies are disposed to act together to this extent. If they are not, then the whole question falls. But if they are not prepared to go even so far, what probability is there that they will be prepared to go the length of complete Federation? If the colonies are to be combined in a government on the model of that of the Dominion of Canada, there must be a Federal Parliament with power to tax and to coerce. It is obvious that the establishment of such a body would be a somewhat considerable undertaking. Mr. GILLIES, we gather, is not at all hopeful that its establishment would be the outcome of the debates of the Congress which Sir HENRY PARKES wishes to see summoned. New South Wales has certainly not hitherto shown any desire to forward Federation. It distinctly withdrew from the Federal Council established by the Federation Act. What has at least the appearance of a sudden change of policy is clearly somewhat puzzling to Mr. GILLIES. His Government is perfectly prepared to discuss a complete scheme. It would rather, or so at least we gather, do one thing at a time, and get its common defence scheme discussed as a preliminary. However, since New South Wales will have it so, it is ready to discuss things in general, only it seems to desire that the sister colony should so far recognize the existing Council as to deal with it, and not to insist on the appointment of special delegates to a special Council. It will be interesting to see what answer Sir HENRY PARKES makes to this demand. To judge from his last despatch, he is very likely to decline, since he seems to have committed himself to the doctrine that the Federation Act is a half measure which no Australian with a proper regard for his dignity would recognize. It would appear that each party to the correspondence is thinking a good deal more of what he does not say than of what he does. Taking the two letters as they stand, we may pardonably suspect that one party is anxious to push on the work of Federation, and to commit its neighbour to it without stating too explicitly whither they are both going, and that the other is determined to upset this calculation by insisting on having an explicit definition of the goal. We cannot agree with some commentators on this correspondence that there is more than a merely formal force in Sir HENRY PARKES's argument that a scheme of common defence necessarily presupposes a common Government, or rather that more is needed than is supplied by the common allegiance to the Crown. If the colonies settle among themselves the strength of their respective contingents and the manner in which they are to combine for service under the Imperial officers appointed to command in Australia, it seems to us that unity of action and the interests of discipline will be quite sufficiently provided for. Sir HENRY PARKES's contention has, we acknowledge, some formal force; but it is, to speak frankly, merely obstructive as coming from a Government which is not really anxious for Federation. If New South Wales really wishes to federate, it could begin by sending representatives to a Federal Council, and then working for the extension of the Council's powers, if it thought an extension necessary. It has not done so, and, therefore, its sudden zeal for Federation when asked to take part in a much more modest scheme is somewhat suspect.

THE BRAZILIAN REVOLUTION.

THERE would possibly be a certain injustice in saying that the course of the Revolution in Brazil calls for the application of certain remarks made by Mr. CARLYLE touching the conduct of kings in the year 1848. "Not one of them," as Mr. CARLYLE observed, "turned round and stood upon his kingship as upon a right he could afford to die for or to risk his skin upon." An elderly gentleman of dilettante tastes and indifferent health could hardly be expected to make a fight single-handed; for it is very clear that there was nobody present at Petropolis or in Rio who showed the smallest disposition to make a fight for poor PETER of Alcantara. The absence of any defender, if it excuses the Royal family for not making a futile resistance, is, however, in itself a succinctly complete condemnation of the late Brazilian Monarchy. The Brazilians cannot be supposed to be a people of much political faculty. If they were, they would hardly allow supreme power to be seized by a military adventurer who impudently justifies his rebellion on the ground that the Brazilians are sufficiently civilized to take care of themselves. They have had, ever since they rebelled against Portugal, a Constitution of the most approved Liberal stamp. A people capable of taking care of themselves could have done so already, without dismissing an EMPEROR who was at all times painfully anxious to show the strictest constitutional orthodoxy. But, if the political faculty of the Brazilians must be supposed to be poor, it is equally clear that there has been a sad want of administrative faculty at headquarters. A family which has lasted for nearly seventy years, which helped to make the independence of the country, which represented the male line of the Royal House of the mother country, ought, it would seem, by judicious appeals to interest and affection, to have secured as much support as would have saved it from being sent packing ignominiously, even though it did rule over an ignorant and indolent people.

When the details have come in we shall know, better at least than we do now, why it came about that so very clean a sweep was made. In the meantime the story is somewhat obscure, and the explanations afforded highly contradictory. That the EMPEROR neglected the business of government; that he governed too much; that the emancipation of the slaves did the mischief; that it all happened because the slaves were not emancipated sooner; that it was all the EMPEROR's daughter; that it was all the EMPEROR's son-in-law—this and half a dozen other explanations, all more or less contradictory and insufficient, have been offered by more or less manifestly uninformed persons. For ourselves, if we were disposed to draw any moral from the story at all, it would be the inadequacy of sentimental Liberalism for the business of government. The EMPEROR has been all that modern Liberal sentiment requires a Sovereign to be. Education, as it is understood by the newest school—that is to say, a superficial acquaintance with twenty unconnected subjects—has been the object of his tenderest care. He did not neglect trade. The rights of the negro to be released from the restraint which keeps him from returning to his congenial lazy barbarism were dear to him. No man ever showed a more amiable wish to be the father of his people, or was more careful to explain that he was content to rule on sufferance. By the marriage of his daughter with the Count d'Eu the EMPEROR established a connexion with the family which is the pink of modern monarchical Liberalism. And yet we see that at the end of it all he has been expelled as effectually and much more easily than a mere King BOMBA. It is not an encouraging example. What is the good of being so careful to do all those things which ought to win you the love of your people, if you are at the mercy of DEODORO DA FONSECA, and the garrison of the capital, after all. The EMPEROR'S virtue seems to have been of no avail, because the elementary precaution of paying the garrison of the capital their wages regularly was neglected. This neglect, if it is true, is sufficient to condemn the administration of the Empire. A Government which buys such ironclads as the Riachuelo, the Aquidaban, and the Javary ought not to be in arrears with an army of sixteen thousand men, and if it must neglect somebody, the last to be neglected should be the garrison of the capital. One thing may be said with confidence, and it is that those who take any interest in Brazil would do well not to jump too hastily to the conclusion that all is over. Marshal DEODORO DA FONSECA and his magniloquent Committee may have got rid of the EMPEROR, but they may also find that they have done more. A revolutionary movement is at all times easier to set going than to stop.

DARTMOOR CONVICT PRISONS.

THE convict prisons on Dartmoor are situated on the high bleak ridge of the moor—1,400 feet above the level of the sea—that separates the watershed eastward, flowing into the river Dart and its tributaries, from the watershed westward, flowing into the rivers Plym and Tavy and their tributaries. This ridge is just on the borders of the Forest (so-called) of Dartmoor, which is part of the inheritance of the Prince of Wales, descended to him from the Black Prince, whence is derived his title of Duke of Cornwall, and is under the management of the well-known office of the Duchy of Cornwall. In the year 1806 the foundation-stones were laid here of the War Prisons, by Sir Thomas Tyrwhitt, Lord Warden of the Stanneries, and these prisons were full of prisoners of war to the end of the war. They were known on Dartmoor as the French prisons because the war was with France, and the prisoners at that time were mostly Frenchmen. It is a melancholy-looking spot; and, although Dartmoor itself has many attractions, it is not here that they are apparent. When the war prisoners were here officers on parole, governors, troops, and officials made the place gay. The Duchy Hotel was then built, and the small town, in which lived all who had anything to do with the prisons, received the name of Prince Town, as a compliment to the Prince of Wales of that time, known on Dartmoor within living memory as the Raygent (Regent), afterwards George IV.

These prisons were massive buildings of granite, the rock of the country, and the outer gateway still remains as the entrance of the present prison. It is an archway composed of five huge granite stones, on the topmost of which is inscribed Parcere Subjectis—a motto impressive to those who enter in at the gate and are free to return. This massive gateway, and the motto cut deeply into the granite, carry one back to the days of the war and the miseries inflicted on many nations by Napoleon.

After the peace the Duchy of Cornwall made some attempts to turn the prisons to account, and the original war prisons, which were very interesting relics of the war, were rented by a Company for naphtha works and partially destroyed. The naphtha works failed, and in 1850 the Government took over the war prisons for a convict prison, and less than 2,000 convicts, comfortably housed and fed, occupy the places of 10,000 heroes of the war, who were huddled together in vast blocks of the prison anyhow. Since 1808 prison management has undergone incredible changes—incredible to those who have not studied the subject—and the convicted felon of to-day, well fed, well clothed, and warm, affords a remarkable contrast to the poor prisoner of war, perhaps from a sunny clime, ill fed, ill clothed, and shivering in a Dartmoor fog. The advance in prison management from 1808 to the present time, just eighty years, is perhaps greater than the progress of any other department of the State, and to those who knew the war prisons as they were left by the prisoners at the peace, the present prisons, clean, dry, heated throughout, with their kitchens, bakeries, baths, and all the modern contrivances for promoting health, offer a contrast indeed. In the old war prisons the blocks or wings of the prison radiated from a centre, and the prisons were surrounded by high double walls, a considerable space being left between the outer and inner walls for the patrol of sentries and warders. Some of the old blocks are still left, but the whole aspect of the prison has changed, and it has a brand-new look about it. The convicts themselves are employed in quarrying, stone-cutting, and building—building new blocks of prisons inside, and officers' houses outside. The new blocks are very well built of solid granite masonry, and look fresh and new by the side of the old parts that yet remain.

The French prisoners of war gave a very bad report of the climate of Dartmoor, and some indignation was felt at the cruelty of sending prisoners of war to such a cold wilderness, where the winds and the rains expend their fury. But the experiment of sending convicts there has brought to light the fact, which at first was rather astonishing, that it is about the most healthy place to be found, and that even prisoners with disease of the lungs are the better for the purity of the air there. It is not a pleasant climate, but it is a very healthy one, and although at first the strongest convicts were sent there, it has now become a prison where invalids are sent.

The original purpose of sending convicts to this prison was to reclaim Dartmoor, and they have made enclosures to an enormous extent, under the superintendence of a farm bailiff. These enclosures are made of most substantial walls of great blocks of granite, which must have cost an amount of labour difficult to estimate. A large piece of the moor is first enclosed; then other enclosures are made, dividing it into good large fields; then clearing the stones and rocks and cultivating for crops begin. This convict prison is, therefore, a very large farm, with any amount of labour at the command of the farmer. On the farm are bred horses, ponies, bullocks, and some sheep. There is a large dairy, and there are extensive kitchen-gardens on the farm. The dairy and garden produce is used in the prison, and very good it is; but the live stock is sold annually by auction in the autumn at Prince Town fair, where Dartmoor produce in general is brought to market, and where the collection of wild ponies is a sight to see.

The prisoners work in gangs, and there are many warders with loaded rifles surrounding them or in attendance. By good conduct a prisoner gains his reward in working under relaxed supervision, and in being entrusted with horses and carts and the dairy work. The colour of the dress denotes the convict ranked according to his behaviour. The dress consists of cap, jacket, loose breeches, stockings, and boots, all of the regulation convict material, not to be mistaken anywhere. But it is a curious fact that the lowest class of convicts are dressed precisely in that particular colour which is least visible at a distance. Sometimes in a fog convicts have escaped; but of late years escapes have been very rare.

In the summer large numbers of convicts can be seen on the farm haymaking or harvesting, and in the winter preparing the land for cultivation. Planting has also been attempted. Trees do not flourish on Dartmoor. But if a particular tree is found by experience to do well, extensive plantations ought to be made of it; for the one thing wanting on Dartmoor Forest is trees. In some situations planting has partially succeeded; but the trees do not look as if they were enjoying themselves in that salubrious clime.

The employment of convicts in hard farm labour in the open air is good for them, inasmuch as they, as a rule, do not come from a class that likes hard labour at all; and it may be safely said that three convicts scarcely do the work of one good farm-labourer. They can be made to work, but they cannot be made to work hard or well. Besides the farm labour, the labour in the quarry, the stone-cutting, and the building, there are carried on within the prison walls shoemaking, tailoring, bookbinding, blacksmith's and carpenter's work, baking, and cooking. Some who have found their way inside these walls, and are not strong enough for the farm, or invalids, are put in the tailors' or shoemakers' shops, to make clothes for their fellow-prisoners; others are put to bookbinding; and there is always plenty to do in the way of washing, scrubbing, and cleaning in general. As a matter of course, there is a school for the ignorant, a chapel and chaplain of the Church of England, and a Roman Catholic chapel and chaplain. The late Father Green devoted his life to these convicts, and has left behind him a name revered and well beloved.

Although all this sounds Arcadian and pleasant, the punishment is nevertheless very severe. To know the life of a convict is to know the severity of the punishment, and hardly anything short of that would suffice to realize it. Judges are giving shorter sentences because crime has decreased of late years, and it may also be said that detection and punishment follow crime more surely than they did, some horrible cases to the contrary notwithstanding. Seven to twenty years of life under the discipline of the Dartmoor convict prison is a dreadful ordeal, look at it as one will. There are two objects in punishment—the major object, to protect the whole people from crime by a sufficient deterrent, the severity of which should be well known and feared, and its certainly to follow crime ensured as far as possible; the minor object, to return the convict to the world a better citizen. Statesmen are occupied with the first, philanthropists with the second, and so far the statesmen have had the best of it, as it is said that prisoners come out worse than they went in, and there is a strong prejudice against those who have undergone the process of reformation in a prison. If the reformation were a reality, there would be a great demand for the services of reformed characters.

On the face of it, viewing Dartmoor convict prisons from the high roads that surround them, and seeing the gangs at work, a very favourable impression of the methods here adopted for a convict prison is made on the mind of the passer-by. But no very great practical results, as a matter of fact, have followed. Doubtless some influences are in operation to diminish crime, but they are not farm labour, dairy labour, bookbinding, or any other labour on Dartmoor. The design to teach a trade is very good; but how many follow the trade so taught afterwards? The convicts are miserable enough, in spite of the public show of honest industry, and the fine-looking buildings; but the true methods of crime deterrents and personal reformation have not yet been hit upon. The prison discipline is severe enough and miserable enough, but it does not seem to deter the real criminal who makes crime a profession from pursuing his chosen walk in life after his time is up.

The convict is put to reclaim Dartmoor, and bids fair to improve it off the face of the earth; but it will be a loss rather than a gain to the country, and that loss sustained at the country's expense. The Duchy of Cornwall will be the richer for it, but the country will be the poorer by thousands of acres of wild, healthy, picturesque forest. The Dartmoor convict prisons answer their purpose in the eyes of the Government. But in the eyes of the people, who year after year visit Dartmoor in greater and greater numbers for their health and recreation, they must be a sore and a blemish.

A FRENCH VIEW OF MR. CHAMBERLAIN.

THE doctrine of Shakspeare's Ulysses—who is perhaps an Elizabethan statesman of the Cecil type, rather than a Homeric Greek, as Lord Tennyson's Ulysses is a bored Victorian gentleman, tired of home life—that men know themselves only as they see themselves in the eyes and minds of others, applies to national self-understanding. Foreign studies of English persons and things ought, therefore, to have a special interest for us. How much our knowledge of the national character owes to the interpretation of our history, philosophy, literature, and laws by Ranke, Pauli, and Gneist among Germans, and by Royer-Collard, Guizot, Charles de Rémusat, and Taine among Frenchmen, needs not be pointed out. To this list we may now add the name of M. Augustin Filon. M. Filon, who is a historic student by inherited tendency, has contributed to the Revue des Deux Mondes interesting estimates of Hogarth as a caricaturist, of Lord Tennyson as a poet, and of Mr. Lecky as a historian. More recently he has condescended to contemporary politicians. Having begun with Lord Randolph Churchill, as the type of the Tory Democrat, he has proceeded, in the current number of the Revue des Deux Mondes, to the examination of the character and position of Mr. Chamberlain, in whom he recognizes the representative of State Socialism. M. Filon's selection of these two statesmen for what, we hope, are only the earliest of a series of similar studies is in part probably due to the fact that their careers are presumably still in their beginning, and that they occupy a critical position in English politics. Our interest, as Mr. Browning somewhere sings or says, is always on the dangerous edge of things; and we watch with suspense a boy walking on a parapet, though we should not bestow a glance or a thought upon him if he were pursuing his way on an even narrower kerb-stone. Will he fall, or keep his footing, and reach the point he aims at? Lord Randolph and Mr. Chamberlain have both detached themselves from the parties to which they once belonged, or rather, in Mr. Chamberlain's case, the party to which he once belonged has detached itself from him, and their future careers have something of the excitement of adventure. The attraction which M. Filon feels towards them has possibly another cause, personal to himself rather than to them. He was for some years private tutor to the late Prince Imperial, whom he followed into exile. He, perhaps, sees in the Tory Democracy of Lord Randolph Churchill, and in the State Socialism which, on the strength of a few random and ill-considered phrases uttered in an earlier part of his career, he considers to be, in an especial sense, the doctrine of Mr. Chamberlain, an affinity with certain tendencies which the Second Empire embodied, or at any rate with which Napoleon III. kept up an electioneering flirtation. He holds Mr. Chamberlain to be the embodiment of French ideas. A minuter acquaintance with the history of English Radicalism would show him that Mr. Chamberlain is a growth from an English stock.

Mr. Chamberlain has much better reason to be satisfied with his analysis than that unfortunate pupil of Dr. Blimber's, whom the dispassionate Cornelia in the half-yearly school report analysed worse than a murderer, with disastrous consequences to his supplies of pocket-money. Mr. Chamberlain emerges from the interrogation to which M. Filon, as a political juge d'instruction, submits him, covered with glory. M. Filon has not a high estimate of English oratory. The Athenian historian said of Brasidas that he was not a bad speaker for a Lacedæmonian. M. Filon says of English public men that, though they speak with ease, they speak ill. But Mr. Chamberlain is an exception, and his speech on introducing the Merchant Shipping Bill would repay analysis and comment with a view to the detection of the secrets of oratoric art as well as the orations Pro Milone and Pro Cælio. M. Filon admits a difference in kind, but not in degree. Mr. Chamberlain's statesmanship is not inferior to his oratory. So far from being a revolutionist, he is a born legislator, organizer, and constructor of societies. He is the real arbiter and inspirer of the domestic policy of Lord Salisbury's Government. The Tory chief has come to him, and not he to the Tory chief. The fact is, that Mr. Chamberlain and Lord Salisbury, like most sensible men, have come practically to the same conclusions as to the legislation which is expedient or inevitable. The change is at least as much in Mr. Chamberlain as in Lord Salisbury. We do not say that the Mr. Chamberlain of 1889 is inconsistent with the Mr. Chamberlain of 1885, but he is not identical with him. The better elements of his character have developed since the separation of 1886, and the less noble have dwindled. The sacrifice of party to country, and association and joint action with men who are animated by a single regard for the greatness and dignity of England, have brought before Mr. Chamberlain's mind ideas which in earlier days were too seldom before it, and developed a side of his character which otherwise might have been suppressed. If Mr. Chamberlain had remained in association with Mr. Labouchere, and had become the ally of Mr. Conybeare and Mr. Tim Healy, he would probably be a very different Mr. Chamberlain from the actual Mr. Chamberlain. As he witnesses Sir William Harcourt's performances, he may very well say to himself "There, but for the grace of God, goes Joseph Chamberlain."

M. Filon does not undervalue the present as compared with the past, or think that the Englishmen of our day are dwarfs in comparison with their ancestors. Quite the contrary. We live in an age of giants. The formation of Mr. Gladstone's Second Administration—that of 1880—was a more important event than the Revolution of 1688; and the separation of Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Gladstone in 1886 was more momentous than the quarrel of Fox and Burke, though not, from the theatrical point of view, so well managed. M. Filon has really a considerable knowledge of English politics, past and present, though his comparative estimates do something more than verge on burlesque. We confess, however, to being less interested in the knowledge which is common to him and to us than in what he knows and we do not. According to M. Filon, the rock out of which Mr. Chamberlain was hewed was a wholesale shoe manufactory at Camberwell; a statement which, if it be true, gives an autobiographic interest to Mr. Chamberlain's recent assertion that shoemakers are always Radicals. Mr. Galton will be interested in the fact. We regret to say that M. Filon makes light of the ejected clergyman to whom Mr. Chamberlain has traced his own sturdy Nonconformity, throwing some doubt upon the very existence of that conscientious and suffering reverend, and computing that among sixty-three other ancestors in the same degree, many of them probably servile Loyalists, his contribution to Mr. Chamberlain's circulating fluid must be considerable. From Camberwell and University College, London, M. Filon follows Mr. Chamberlain to Birmingham. Mr. Chamberlain's relation to Birmingham is illustrated by a reference to Pericles and Athens, Genoa and Doria, Florence and the Medicis. If, finding it brick, he did not leave it marble, the building materials of our time are to blame, not Mr. Chamberlain. When Mr. Chamberlain hears Birmingham mentioned his countenance brightens and his eye expands; when a Birmingham man hears Mr. Chamberlain's name mentioned he murmurs fondly "Our Joey," as the constituents of Roumestan cried "Our Numa." When Mr. Chamberlain walks the streets of the town, of which he is the second founder, he has an intimate consciousness of the thought of the people and is mysteriously penetrated by it. M. Filon admits that Mr. Chamberlain does not know every one in Birmingham by name, but he knows most of them by sight. If in this respect he is inferior to Themistocles, it must be remembered that Birmingham is a good deal more populous than Athens was.

It is interesting to know that Mr. Chamberlain's sympathy for the poor was stimulated by the spectacle of the collectors of "l'Income-Tax—l'impôt des pauvres," calling at the wretched hovels of the most poverty-stricken classes for this cruel levy. M. Filon gives a graphic description of the reception of "le Prémptif"—such is the title, we gather, by which the Prince of Wales is known in England—by Mr. Chamberlain during his mayoralty, and of the conviction which flashed on the Presumptive's mind, as he shook hands with his host, that he was embracing his future Prime Minister. Mr. Chamberlain's defeat at Sheffield in 1874 by "un vieux comique parlementaire appelé Roebuck" is a matter of history. M. Filon describes the gradual degrees by which Mr. Chamberlain found his way into Parliament, acquired a knowledge of the forms of the House, such as the rules which prescribe that members who are officers must be described as "gallant," lawyers "learned," the sons of viscounts and barons, and apparently they only, "honourable," and clergymen "reverend." M. Filon also describes the composition of the House of Commons, into which members of the Church of England, as well as members of the bar, bankers and merchants are admitted.

Mr. Chamberlain's equal passion for flowers and children, his splendid library, rich in oak and green leather, and strewn with French novels—most of them, M. Filon hastens to add, uncut—are graphically and tenderly depicted. Mr. Chamberlain's eye-glass is well known. But its true function in Mr. Chamberlain's economy is disclosed for the first time by M. Filon. The final purpose, we gather, is not so much that its possessor may see, as that he may not be seen. When it drops, as eye-glasses will drop, in spite of the utmost vigour of the orbital muscles, another Chamberlain than he whom the world knows is disclosed. The tension of the features relaxes, the ironic smile disappears, the glance becomes clouded and veiled; inner meditation or a distant thought supplants neighbouring objects; "you confusedly recognize behind the man of action and authority a nature of another sort, emotional, dreamy, undecided." Mr. Chamberlain will have to be careful of his monocle. If domestic faction or foreign intrigue were to deprive him of it, an act of weakness might ruin his party or the country. Of Mr. Chamberlain's future career, M. Filon can only pray that it may be given to him in his old age to renew the great work of Cobden and Napoleon III. One thing, however, M. Filon is certain of—"Quoiqu'il arrive," he passionately and rather irrelevantly concludes, "j'ose en répondre, Joseph Chamberlain ne sera pas un second Crispi."

EXHIBITIONS.

THE eternal romance which hangs around the name and fate of Mary Queen of Scots will probably make the exhibition of drawings which Sir James Linton and Mr. James Orrock have brought together at the Old Bond Street Galleries a popular one. To see no less than twelve of Sir James Linton's highly-finished water-colour studies of the figure with costume is in itself an unusual pleasure, and there is thrown in besides an ambitious historical group, "The Abdication of Mary" (26). This latter, however, is not one of the painter's successes. It is old-fashioned and obvious in composition, and the faces are rather soft in modelling and poor in expression. The single-figure pieces are, almost without exception, better. Sir James Linton's method is uniform. He takes a subject, Mary Beton, let us say, or George Douglas. He dresses up a pretty-featured girl or a fresh-looking youth in the costume of the period, and then he produces a lustrous, almost vitreous, portrait, with peach-coloured flesh-tints, soft sombre background, and raiment as gay as one of Mr. Marks's macaws, but, of course, much more harmoniously executed. In the present case, he appears to have allowed himself to be influenced by all the existing traditions of the appearance of his personages; but such traditions are eminently scanty and delusive, and have not helped him much.

Sir James Linton's "Mary Stuart" (29) is a kind of combination, like the samples people photograph of the "composite" head of Shakspeare, of all existing portraits and impressions. Who shall say that this is not the face that fired so many Troys? At the same time, we have a conviction that Mr. Swinburne will not be satisfied, and that his dreams have revealed to him something more brilliant and, above all, more intellectual than this. The painter's Mary Stuart is mild, gentle, and soft:—

Some faults the gods will give to fatter
Man's highest intent:
But surely you were something better Than innocent!

we murmur as we turn from this meek, plump specimen of womanhood. In Sir James Linton's pretty face there is too little flame for our idea of Mary, too little force, the outlines are somewhat too ripe and fruit-like. This is one of Shakspeare's "flower-soft" women, but not quite Mary the Queen. It is rather some maid of honour than the mistress. It might be Charmian; it could not be Cleopatra. But Sir James Linton's Four Maries, the lesser lights of that amorous constellation, are charming. Mary Seton (20), in a crimson dress, holding a peacock fan, and Mary Beton, in the softest green satin, like a dream of April, are delightful, and we return to their sweet and demure countenances again and again. Sir James Linton's men are not quite so thoughtfully rendered. This manly fellow in his grass-green velvet doublet, with the red mantle hanging from his shoulders (23), is he not far too fresh and stalwart, and much too old, for the feeble and vicious Darnley, who, be it remembered, was scarcely more than a boy when earth and heaven split about him? We think Sir James Linton might have interpreted a little less conventionally for us—

those void hands
That never plighted faith with men and kept,
Poor lips athirst for woman's lips and wine,
Poor tongue that lied, poor eyes that looked askant
And had no heart to face men's wrath or love.

But, after all, we like Rizzio (110) least. This is a clever drawing, lighter in tone than most of Sir James Linton's, and we should only praise it if it were nameless. But what is there here of the "dwarfish and deformed" David Rizzio? There is no suggestion of deformity, and, what is worse perhaps, none of personal distinction. To have fascinated the Queen as the Piedmontese secretary did there must have been something more striking about the man than this head suggests. Rizzio must have looked an artist, if not a gentleman. This is a street type, vigorous, mean, canaille to the last degree. The little eye, like a rat's, is especially wrong, it strikes us. Rizzio must have had fine eyes, however dark his hue was and however ill his favour.

That Mr. Orrock has been extremely industrious will not be denied by any one who examines these hundred and odd drawings of Scottish scenery. They are now modest and now ambitious, here slight and there full; but, in whatever style they are executed, they possess an odd family likeness. They belong, moreover, to a class of water-colour drawing that is now out of date. They keep to all the fine old crusted traditions of the English school. They present us with a kind of sepia foliage and a peculiar atmospheric blue that were in fashion when Aaron Penley taught the art of sketching in water-colours thirty years ago. Mr. Orrock sees the world traditionally, through Ossianic spectacles. The convention that produces such a highly-finished composition as his "Hermitage Castle, Liddesdale" (5), is so respectable that we hardly can screw up our courage to point out that nature never, at morning, noon, or night, in rain or sunlight, in storm or calm, looks in the least degree like that. The thing is an elegant convention. It is painted after the received mode of the New Society of Painters in Water-Colours, of which Mr. Orrock is a most estimable survivor. Many of the scenes which the painter portrays are at various periods of the year—nay, at most periods—full of splendid colour, but he seems to perceive none but his decent alternations of brown and blue. And yet far be it from us to deny academic merit to this kind of work. The atmosphere is often tenderly painted; the warm browns and purple greys are gracefully opposed, but there is a monotony about all these landscapes that wearies the eye, and they are unpardonably genteel. The roughness and strangeness of nature are absent from them, and life itself is sacrificed to an estimable tradition.

THE FINANCIAL CONSEQUENCES OF THE BRAZILIAN REVOLUTION.

THE effect so far of the Brazilian Revolution upon the European money and stock markets has been less than might reasonably have been anticipated. There has, it is true, been a fall in the prices of Brazilian securities; but it has not been very great, and already there has been some recovery. The explanation, no doubt, is that the Revolution has taken the world by surprise. Even the great financial houses of London and Paris who were most intimately connected with Brazil were quite unprepared for what has occurred. And the intelligence as yet received has been meagre. There is, in fact, as yet neither time nor means for accurately calculating probable consequences. Besides, the news, such as it is, is encouraging. The Imperial family has quietly accepted its deposition and left the country. The provinces have all recognized the provisional Government, and the army and navy are well in hand. For the moment, then, people are waiting upon events. It may, however, even now reasonably be concluded that gold shipments to Brazil are, for this year at all events, at an end. It will be in the recollection of our readers, as was explained in these columns some weeks ago, that the late Brazilian Government recently decided upon the resumption of specie payments and the withdrawal of the existing inconvertible paper. With that view, it granted very large concessions to a group of native and European capitalists who undertook to found the National Bank of Brazil. The Bank has been created, and in consequence large amounts of gold have already been sent to Rio de Janeiro. It was understood that considerable sums more would have to be sent, and the apprehension of this was one of the causes of the uneasy feeling in the London money market. Now, however, it is in the highest degree improbable that the gold will be sent. When once an army takes to making revolutions, it is difficult to foresee where it will stop. Besides, it is yet uncertain whether a federal Republic can be constituted, and until the situation is cleared up, it would hardly be wise for European capitalists to invest much more largely in Brazil. Some of the gold that was to be sent was intended for other large projects besides the National Bank, undertaken by Continental, and especially by Parisian, bankers. And these projects will, for a while at all events, have to be dropped. The stoppage of gold exports to Brazil will, of course, be favourable to the London money market, gold will have to be sent from here to other countries; but if the drain to Brazil is at an end, the market will be better able to supply the other demands. It is not improbable, too, that gold may be exported from Brazil to Europe. It has always been found in European countries that, when revolutions occur, the propertied classes remit to countries where order is maintained such portable property as they can easily realize. It is to be expected that Brazilian capitalists will do the same. If civil war threatens, they will almost certainly do so; for they will wish to put in a place of safety as much of their wealth as they can, and, even if actual fighting does not take place, some of them will be likely to send gold. They will argue that further pronunciamentos are to be apprehended, that the federal arrangements will involve much friction, and that a new Government will be less capable than the old of tiding over the difficulties involved in the emancipation of the slaves. Many capitalists, too, must dislike so great a change in the form of government, and many will doubtless think that Europe will be a pleasanter place of residence than Brazil for some time to come. It will be strange, therefore, if some amount of gold is not exported from Brazil to Europe. Whether foreign capitalists who already have large amounts of the metal employed in Brazil will also withdraw portions of it depends chiefly upon the course of events. A disturbed political condition always raises the rates of interest and discount. Therefore, when the public mind is apprehensive, bankers are able to employ their money more profitably than in quiet times. But, on the other hand, disturbed periods also involve greater risks, and against the inducement to increase the funds held in Brazil for banking purposes there is, therefore, the apprehension of greater danger. If order is maintained, Europeans probably will not withdraw much of their money. But if civil war threatens, very large withdrawals are not unlikely.

With respect to the Stock Exchange, it seems safe to predict that the consequence of the revolution must be to lower prices. Whether the decline will be considerable or not depends upon the course of events. If the new Government is able to keep the country together, to maintain order, and to secure life and property, the fall will probably be slight. But if any of the provinces secede, it may be very heavy. Even if secession is prevented, and yet fighting takes place, it can hardly fail to be very considerable. In the most favourable event, however, the tendency of prices will almost inevitably be downward, for there must be many persons dissatisfied with the change, and these are likely to be amongst the well-to-do classes. Several of these, as we observe above, are likely to fear that once the era of revolutions is opened it will not soon be ended, and therefore that residence in Europe promises to be safer and pleasanter than residence at home. If so, they will sell Brazilian securities and invest the money in Europe. Their sales alone will tell unfavourably upon the market. Besides, it is to be recollected that the economic condition of Brazil is by no means satisfactory. The country is of immense extent, no doubt, and has great resources, but the population is exceedingly scanty. According to a consular Report recently published, it appears that the public debt of Brazil, external, internal, and unfunded, amounted twelve months ago to about 90 millions sterling. Since then there has been the issue of an internal loan of $11\frac{1}{4}$ millions sterling, and the withdrawal of the present forced paper currency involves an addition to the debt of 20 or 30 millions sterling. Assuming that the financial measures of the late Government are carried into effect, the public debt of Brazil will at an early period amount to 120 or 130 millions. Then there is a provincial debt of at least 6 millions sterling, and there is a municipal debt of uncertain magnitude. Over and above all this, Brazil has given guarantees to all sorts of industrial enterprises. The railway stocks guaranteed by the Government amount to about 18 or 20 millions sterling, and there are guarantees to coffee plantations, sugar factories, and other enterprises. The greater part of this immense mass of securities is held by Europeans. Even the late internal loan was either underwritten by European capitalists or has been pledged to London and Paris bankers since its issue. It will be seen that the good order of Brazilian finance is of very great importance to Europeans, and unfortunately Englishmen are more interested than the people of any other country. Of late, it is true, both French and German capitalists have bought very largely. Several of the great French bankers who promoted the National Bank of Brazil engaged in numerous other projects which were to be carried through by means of French capital chiefly, and these bankers and their friends have been buying Brazilian securities of all kinds on a very large scale. Still, there can be no reasonable doubt that British investments in Brazil greatly exceed in value those of other countries. But Brazilian expenditure has been too rapid for the resources of the country, and every year, therefore, has ended in a heavy deficit. This fact alone must, in the long run, cause a decline in the prices of Brazilian securities; but when to extravagant expenditure is added political uncertainty, it seems inevitable that prices must tend downwards. Assuming, however, that nothing to cause fresh alarm happens, it is quite probable that there may be a recovery from the fall of this week. The supporters of the new order of things will naturally be anxious to inspire confidence at home and abroad, and therefore will be ready to adopt any measures likely to support the credit of the country. Capitalists on the Continent who have started the National Bank of Brazil, and who have committed themselves to numerous other Brazilian projects, will have a strong temptation to assist the market to the best of their power, and other great houses which in the past have brought out Brazilian loans will feel their reputation more or less affected by Brazilian credit. It would not be surprising, then, if there were first an upward movement, followed a little later by a steady decline in prices.

Much, no doubt, will depend upon the coming harvest. Good crops will make it more easy to maintain order; bad crops will make it more difficult. Much also will depend upon whether the Revolution checks or encourages immigration. The area of Brazil is variously stated at from three millions to three and a quarter millions of square miles—that is to say, it is about the size of the United States, exclusive of Alaska, or about twice the size of India, including the native States. No census has been taken since 1872; but last year an ex-Minister estimated the population at about $13\frac{1}{4}$ millions; about a quarter of these, or somewhat less, are whites, the rest being negroes, Indians, and mixed breeds. A quarrel between the whites would clearly make it difficult for them to maintain their authority over the remainder of the population. At all events, it would afford an opportunity for the rising of the coloured people. Further, it is evident that the prosperity of the country would be immensely stimulated by a large immigration. The whites would be reinforced, and the effective working population would at the same time be largely increased. Immigration would rapidly extend the area of cultivation, would augment the demand for the produce of the country, would increase the traffic of the railways, and swell the revenue of the Government. If, then, immigrants can be attracted in considerable numbers, the credit of Brazil may be maintained. It is probable that immigrants would side with the established Government, whatever it was. They would go to the country for the purpose of pushing their own fortunes, and they would know that prosperous industry would be impossible in case of civil war. Unless, therefore, political adventurers flocked into the country in large numbers, the probability is that foreign immigrants would support the form of government they found existing when they landed, their main desire being the maintenance of order. Both politically and economically, therefore, it would be an immense gain to Brazil if a large European immigration could be attracted. But it seems hardly probable that it can be attracted while the political condition of the country remains uncertain. Besides, the climate, speaking generally, is not favourable to Europeans. Even for Southern Europeans it is too hot, and they are more attracted by the Argentine Republic, where progress is more rapid, and where the era of revolution seems to be closed. The attractiveness of the country for Europeans being thus less than that of other American States, it is probable that the political uncertainty now beginning will check immigration. Upon the whole, then, we come to the conclusion that the prices of Brazilian securities of all kinds will tend lower for some time to come. If, indeed, order is efficiently maintained, and under the new system a better financial administration is established, there will be an ultimate recovery; but there seems no reason to expect a better financial administration. The finances were thrown into disorder, firstly, by the Paraguayan war, and, secondly, by the desire to develop rapidly the resources of the Empire. The consequences of the Paraguayan war are still felt, and a Republican Government is hardly likely to be less anxious for pushing forward public works and developing resources than the Imperial Government. Even under the most favourable circumstances, then, there are no grounds for expecting such an early change in the economic condition of the country as would justify higher credit; while, if circumstances are not favourable, if political disturbance or uncertainty continues, or even if the administration falls into the hands of mere adventurers, the position will become worse and worse every year.

THE INDIAN CIVIL SERVICE EXAMINATION.

ACCORDING to a notice issued last week, the maximum age for candidates in the competitive examination for the Indian Civil Service is to be raised from 19, at which it has stood since 1876, to 23 years. The alteration decided upon by Lord Cross is a reversion to former practice, and there is much to be said for it. But the announcement calls attention to the constant changes which have taken place in recruiting what is, perhaps, the finest service an Englishman can enter. When the good old days of Haileybury were doomed, and it was considered necessary to bring the service more into a line with modern theories, Lord Macaulay's influence was still in the ascendant. An Indian career had more charm about it then than now, and demanded more independence and self-reliance than in these days of telegraphs and statistical reports. Moreover, the pagoda-tree had better fruit to be shaken before the decline of silver and the curse of entertaining globe-trotters. Lord Macaulay was confident that the East would attract clever men from colleges, who would otherwise look to a Fellowship and possible career at the Bar. The maximum age for competitors was fixed at 23, in order to catch this class, and for a while Lord Macaulay was justified. Oxford and Cambridge supplied excellent material for some years, men of ability, and also—for this was Lord Macaulay's second requisite—men who had enjoyed the social advantages of residence on the banks of Isis or Cam. But it was too good to last. The competition grew keener as the examination became more widely known. The Universities would not, and indeed had no business to, "specialize" for the Indian Civil Service Examination. But private enterprise could, and did, specialize. By degrees University men found it prudent to put in an extra term during the Long Vacation with a "coach" or a "crammer," or indeed to forsake college altogether for the last six months or year before the competition. And, finally, parents who naturally wished to purchase their sons' success at the least possible cost, and to be as sure as the chances of competition allowed of their bargain, "cut" the University altogether, and sent their boys direct to the crammer. The process was hastened by the reduction of the maximum age from 23 to 22 in 1859, and again from 22 to 21 in 1864, at which it remained till 1876. Hence, though brilliant men from the Universities occasionally got straight into the Civil Service without the help of an intermediary, all practical connexion between the candidates and the Universities ceased. It was an extremely rare thing for a successful man to go up to either Oxford or Cambridge to pass his period of probation before actually taking his passage. There was no inducement for him to do so. The University was of no help to him in passing his periodical examinations.

Accordingly a cry began to rise up against the crammers, which gathered in volume until Lord Salisbury succeeded the Duke of Argyll. The complaint was perfectly well founded in the interests of India, although a great many ridiculous and extravagant charges were brought against the crammer. Instances of most undoubted cramming, no doubt, there were. But, taking them as a body, the private coaches for the Indian Civil were simply gentlemen who had the address and energy to supply a recognized want. By dint of fewer holidays and longer hours, and a special study of the examination subjects, they produced candidates who could beat the University men, exposed to the distractions, healthy as those distractions might be, of University life, in their own subjects. Intellectually their men might be quite up to the standard of University first-classmen, if not to the standard demanded by Lord Macaulay. But they could not, and they never pretended to, furnish the social training obtainable at Oxford and Cambridge. Here was the flaw in the system. It came to be recognized that something besides intellect was needed for the government of India; that, in fact, manners, knowledge of men, and some approximation to the old esprit de corps so admirably fostered at Haileybury, were imperatively demanded. These qualities could be best turned out at the Universities, while the life of young men, most of them living in lodgings near their coach, and exposed to the temptations of London under the pressure of severe mental labour and of sedentary habits, was anything but physically or morally desirable. Lord Salisbury determined to deal with the question, and as his predecessors had relied upon the Universities for their men, and had been disappointed, he resolved to break new ground, and to turn to the Public Schools. Nor were the head-masters reluctant in clamouring for their opportunity. So the age was lowered to 19, and by a most excellent provision successful candidates had solid inducements offered them to pass their probationary period at Oxford and Cambridge; while the Universities, following Professor Jowett's lead, broke through their ancient routine, and made special arrangements to meet the Government's views. But two questions remained. Would the head-masters hold their own against the "crammers" even on this ground, practically, of their own choosing? Would competition at the lower age be an equally good test as at the higher, or not prove a greater evil (for competitive examinations are always an evil) to boys of under 19 than to young men of 20 or 21? As regards the first question, it must be admitted that the head-masters failed to justify their expectations. Clifton and Cheltenham, and several other schools, particularly those of a modern type, did train a certain number of successful candidates. But the great majority of successes, as before, came from the crammer, and few parents could resist the temptation of sending a lad to him for a year to make sure. On the second point Lord Salisbury could quote Lord Lawrence's opinion in favour of sending out Civilians young to India in order that they may develop a sympathy both for the country and the natives. The authority is weighty; but nevertheless the young Civilians do not seem to have given entire satisfaction in India, and there is a general consensus against Lord Lawrence that the two or three extra years in England afford recruits with more character and physique.

There appears to be a nearly equal unanimity that the result of competition and cramming just between 17 and 19 (when a boy should be completing his school career as captain of the Eleven) is more injurious than between 19 and 21. Lord Derby, with his unerring common sense, had uttered a pregnant warning on the subject as long ago as 1853. "I do not believe," he said in arguing for Lord Macaulay's limit of age, "that the accidental distinction one may obtain at the age of 17 or 18 is any great test of real ability, because obviously distinction at that age depends more frequently on the injurious effect of cramming and artificial training than on the spontaneous efforts of the mind." Lord Salisbury's scheme had not been in operation more than five or six years before grave complaints were made against it. It was condemned by Lord Northbrook and Lord Ripon, and finally by Lord Dufferin. But the system had a fair trial, and it was resolved to make no change until the Public Service Commission had reported. That Commission was to some extent appointed to meet the wishes of the educated natives, one of whose complaints has been that the reduction in the age made it infinitely more difficult for a native to come over to London and compete. It was therefore natural to expect that the natives would be, as in fact they are, in favour of a higher age. But the remarkable thing is, that among the numerous Europeans, official and non-official, consulted, a practical unanimity in the same direction exists. The demand is for men of maturer character. To withstand a Commission which they were virtually pledged to support would have been impossible for the Government of India, and Lord Cross really had no option but to revert to the older age. The balance of experience is certainly in its favour. But it is much to be regretted that spending the probationary period at Oxford and Cambridge will have to be dropped if, as seems necessary, its duration is shortened. And it is doubtful whether the Universities will be any more successful than they were before in beating the crammers. But one thing is certain. The very best men are wanted to govern India now that the European element in the administration is to be reduced, and every honest magistrate has to endure the foul slanders of the vernacular press. As for the dread of an influx of natives under the new limit of age, we think that the fears which have been expressed are exaggerated. In fact, before 1876 the percentage of successful natives was not larger than it has been since, while there is, indeed, reason to believe that the precocious native intellect is at its best between 17 and 19, whereas the stamina of the Englishman tells later. However, if young Englishmen cannot beat natives on their own soil and in their own language, then it is clear that the received beliefs of the comparative merits of Englishmen and of natives needs amending.

RECENT CONCERTS.

MR. HENSCHEL last Thursday week began a fresh series of Symphony Concerts at St. James's Hall, before an audience which was regrettably small. Mr. Henschel has been blamed because he is not a first-rate conductor; but, though his beat is certainly peculiar, he is every bit as good as the majority of English conductors. His orchestra consists of tried artists, and his programmes contain an admirably selected combination of standard works and interesting novelties. During the winter months he has no competition to fear, and the prices charged for admission are so low that it would be imagined that amateurs of all classes would welcome the London Symphony Concerts gladly, as supplying a deficiency which has been long felt. It is an open secret that the Richter Concerts rely for their success partly upon the fact that they have become fashionable, and partly because the management is content with the performance of familiar works. In the interests of art it is to be hoped that Mr. Henschel will not follow their example; but, if London is to be freed from the reproach of not being able to support during the winter such a series of orchestral concerts as would be found in any German town of second- or third-rate importance, amateurs must bestir themselves before it is too late; for an impresario cannot, merely in the interests of art, be expected year after year to carry on an enterprise which may mean pecuniary loss. According to the advice of his critics, Mr. Henschel has this season fixed an earlier hour for his concerts, so as to appeal to the music-lovers of the suburbs, who are tied down by such considerations as late trains and last omnibuses; he has also adopted the system of Analytical Programmes, which, though not very full, are amply sufficient for people who like to know something about the music they are listening to. The programme of the first concert was in every respect excellent. Beginning with Bach's Orchestral Suite in D, it included a Symphony by Haydn, Beethoven's Overture to Egmont, and finished with Brahms's First Symphony, thus practically presenting in a small compass a series of examples of the gradual development of orchestral music during the last hundred and fifty years. Nothing could have been happier than such an idea, and the execution throughout was more than satisfactory. There was very little fault to be found with any of the performances, and some—notably the two Symphonies—were so good as fully to deserve the warm applause with which they were received. It is to be hoped sincerely that the remaining concerts will be better attended, for it would be a matter for real regret if Mr. Henschel should be obliged to discontinue them.

It was probably the want of Oratorio concerts, which is so marked a feature of the present musical season, which induced Mr. Manns to devote last Saturday afternoon at the Crystal Palace to Mendelssohn's St. Paul. The work has been so seldom heard in London of late years that the performance had almost the interest of a revival, and the Sydenham concert-room was accordingly crowded to its utmost extent. With musicians St. Paul will always take rank with Mendelssohn's best work. It is conceived more in the true spirit of oratorio than the more popular Elijah, and almost every page shows the master at his greatest. The profound attention with which it was listened to last Saturday, and the frequent applause which broke through the self-imposed rule of reverent silence which the audience seemed at first inclined to establish, showed that the work needs only to be oftener heard to become as established a favourite as its more obviously impressive companion. The performance was, on the whole, good; but Mr. Manns, who is unrivalled as an orchestral conductor, is not as much at home with a large and imperfectly-trained chorus; when the attention of the singers can only be attracted by the incessant beating of the conductor's stick on the score it shows that a work has been, to say the least, very insufficiently rehearsed. But, in spite of this, the choral singing was much better than is usually the case at the Crystal Palace; and, if the altos could be strengthened and the exceedingly unpleasant tone of the tenors remedied, the choir might in time become a really good one. The solos were sung by Miss Anna Williams, Mme. Marian Mackenzie, and Messrs. Lloyd, Brereton, Grice, and Bailey. The soprano and the tenor divided the honours. Mme. Mackenzie was hardly at home in this style of music; her recitative singing, in particular, was uneven and exaggerated. Mr. Brereton was very unsatisfactory in the air "Consume them all," principally owing to the habit he has of forcing his high notes, which are never very strong, and are unfitted for the strain he puts upon them. This was doubtless principally owing to the difficulty of filling so large a space with a voice of moderate power; in the latter part of the work his singing was much more satisfactory. A word of praise must be bestowed upon Messrs. Grice and Bailey for their careful performance of the music allotted to the False Witnesses.

Last Monday's Popular Concert at St. James's Hall attracted a larger audience than has so far this season attended any of Mr. Chappell's Concerts. This was doubtless owing principally to the presence in the programme of Brahms's Zigeuner Lieder, Op. 103, which, although only produced last year, have already become an established favourite with the public, especially when they are sung so admirably as by Mrs. Henschel, Miss Little, Messrs. Shakespeare and Henschel, who were the vocalists last Monday. But, in addition to this, the programme contained another attraction in the shape of a new Sonata for Violoncello and Pianoforte, written by Professor Stanford during a visit paid last September to Signor Piatti in his home on the Lake of Como. The new work produced a very favourable impression. It consists of the orthodox three movements, though the second of these, an Andante con Moto, combines by changes of tempo something of the character of the ordinary slow movement with that of a Scherzo. Both it and the concluding Allegro are at a first hearing the best parts of the work, and are characterized by much poetic feeling and considerable charm. The opening movement is less interesting; it appears more suited to a younger and more impetuous performer than to the veteran Italian artist; indeed, the whole work would have gained by a more energetic performance. At its conclusion, both Signor Piatti and the composer were recalled amid much applause. The remainder of Monday's Concert consisted of Beethoven's Quintet in C major, Op. 29, for strings, and of two violin solos by Joachim Raff, which were admirably played by Mme. Neruda. The first of these, "Im Rosengarten zu Worms," is graceful and poetical; the second, which bears the curious title "Was er vom Werbelein gelernt," was recently played by the same artist with orchestral accompaniment at one of Mr. Kuhe's concerts at the Albert Hall, where it was called "Ungarische." It is a commonplace show-piece, of no merit.

MONEY MATTERS.

THE Brazilian revolution exercised more influence over the stock markets this week than all other causes combined. The Scrip of the new Conversion Loan fell from about $2\frac{1}{2}$ premium to about $3\frac{1}{2}$ discount—full 6*l.*—and there was a decline more or less in all other Brazilian securities. There has since been some recovery, for all the intelligence, though extremely scanty, and, no doubt, subject to Government censorship, is uniformly favourable. Still, it will be a long time before the old confidence in Brazilian stocks revives. It is said that the great house which for so many years acted as the financial agent of the Brazilian Government in Europe, and has brought out its successive loans, and even those houses which have to a great extent supplanted it of late, and the other day promoted the National Bank of Brazil, were as ignorant as the rest of the world of what was about to happen. If the most powerful houses in Europe, with the greatest and keenest interest in Brazil, absolutely knew nothing until Saturday morning of what was going on below the surface in that country, and yet a Republic was substituted for the Empire almost without firing a shot, and the Imperial Family was shipped out of the country in four-and-twenty hours, people naturally ask, Who can say what surprises are yet in store for us? The effect of the revolution was by no means confined to Brazilian securities. Speculators in those securities have naturally been realizing stocks more readily saleable on terms more favourable to themselves. If there were to be a new alarm, and a heavier fall, speculators might be ruined, unless they had provided themselves with funds. Doubtless, also, capitalists have been providing themselves with the means of taking advantage of anything that may occur. Certain houses would feel bound to support markets were matters to grow worse, and others would like to be able to buy cheap if the opportunity occurs. There is still another cause of the uneasy feeling inspired by the revolution. A group of powerful French bankers has of late been investing themselves largely in Brazil and Brazilian securities. They started, it will be recollected, the National Bank of Brazil the other day with a capital of ten millions sterling, half to be provided in Europe. And they have many other new projects in preparation. But it must not be lost sight of that the Paris market has been severely tried this year. At the very beginning there occurred the failure of the Panama Canal Company. Very shortly afterwards came the breakdown of the Copper Syndicate, and the failure of the Comptoir d'Escompte and of the Société des Métaux. Now, if there were to be a heavy fall in Brazilian securities, there would be an additional serious loss inflicted. What the consequences might be nobody can say. The losses of certain great capitalists in Paris who have still been able to weather the storms of the early part of the year have been enormous, and they might not be able to go through another trying crisis. In any event it is clear that their Brazilian plans are at an end for the moment. They have locked up much of their money in Brazilian investments, and, if they were to try to realize, they would have to submit to heavy loss. The Berlin market has not been tried like that of Paris, but speculation has run utterly wild in Berlin, and, indeed, all over Germany, and the Liquidation now going on is a difficult one. German capitalists, like the French, have been investing considerably in Brazil of late; and a Brazilian crisis would increase very severely the difficulties in Berlin. It is not wonderful, then, that the news of the revolution sent a very unpleasant thrill through the City, and stopped, for the time being at all events, the speculative activity that was just beginning.

Were it not for the revolution, we should in all probability have seen a very considerable rise this week in British railway stocks. The money market is easier than seemed at all likely a little while ago; trade is exceedingly good; and the traffic returns issued this week by the Companies show unusually large increases. It seems certain, therefore, that the dividends to be declared next January and February for the current half-year will be very satisfactory to the shareholders. Investors, of course, will bear in mind that next year the rise in prices and wages will add heavily to the working expenses; but speculators do not trouble themselves with a future so distant as seven or eight months hence. The present and immediate future are what concern them, and they promise well. At the end of last week there was, indeed, active speculation, and it looked as if the speculation would become still more active this week; but the Brazilian news took the spirit out of speculators, and the market has, in consequence, been dull. At the end of last week, too, it seemed as if speculation in American railroad securities was about to revive. The experience of the past two or three years had taught caution to speculators in those securities; but at last the rise in prices has been carried so far in New York, and the reports concerning trade in the United States are so good, while the railway traffic returns published are likewise so favourable, that it seemed as if European speculation was about to begin on a very considerable scale. The Brazilian revolution, however, was not the only reason why the expectation has been disappointed. A report got abroad in the United States that the Secretary of the Treasury intends to withdraw nearly $9\frac{1}{2}$ millions sterling, which at present he has on deposit with bankers. It was feared that, if he did so, he would throw the money market into confusion; and in fact rates in New York rose in almost panic fashion. The Secretary, however, now states that, though it is true that he is contemplating the measure, he does not consider the present a favourable moment for beginning it, and he will be careful whenever it is done not to injure or inconvenience trade. Apparently what he has in view is to compel bankers to sell bonds to him. He deposits money with bankers on the security of United States bonds. While he does this he finds it impossible to buy all the bonds that he wishes for, except at prices that he is unwilling to give. He naturally concludes that, if he calls in his deposits, and refuses to lend to the bankers in future, they will be compelled to sell their bonds to him. Thus he will be able to effect a large measure of redemption.

The Brazilian news had less effect upon the money market than on the Stock Exchange, but such influence as it exercised was towards ease. As is pointed out elsewhere, it is improbable that much gold will be sent to Rio while political uncertainty lasts, and it is not unlikely that gold may be exported from that city. At the beginning of the week the report about the intentions of Mr. Secretary Windom, which sent up rates so rapidly in New York, caused apprehension here that gold might be withdrawn from the Bank of England for New York; but since then Mr. Windom has bought over half a million sterling nominal value of bonds, and the money of course will relieve the stringency in New York. At the same time, American buying of American railroad securities during the past week or ten days in London has been on a very large scale. This will form a set-off against the large exports from the United States to this country, and will make it less probable that gold will have to be shipped to New York. Still the state of the money market makes operators anxious, for it is felt to be artificial. The rates of interest and discount would be much higher were it not that the great financial houses have brought gold, and are bringing it, from entirely unexpected quarters. If they continue to import the metal whenever necessary, for the sake of keeping markets quiet, the value of money will probably remain about what it is. But, on the other hand, if they were to cease importing, there might be a very sharp rise in rates, for the demand for gold for various countries is yet large, and is likely to continue. There is even a report that shipments to Brazil will soon recommence. That does not seem probable in the present state of the country; but the fact that the report circulates is calculated to revive apprehension, and gold may go in very large amounts in other directions.

The buying of silver, which suddenly ceased last week, began again about the middle of this week, and the price instantly rose once more to 44*d.* per oz. The Mint demand continues, and there is a large foreign demand which may be American or Continental. There is also a good Indian demand at a little under 44*d.* per oz. The rise in silver, which seems likely to continue, and will certainly continue if the American coinage of the metal is doubled, has caused the securities of all silver-using countries to advance of late. Rupee paper, for instance, has risen this week about $\frac{3}{4}$. There is also a demand for the shares of Australian silver-mining Companies. It is curious that, of the large number of American, Mexican, and Peruvian silver-mining Companies which have been either formed or introduced into this country exceedingly few—less than half a dozen, we believe—pay dividends, the really good properties being owned at home. But one Australian Company, which was formed only four years ago, has in the interval paid in dividends a good deal more than the original capital subscribed. This Company has sold part of its properties to subsidiary Companies formed in London, and the prices of these subsidiary and newly-formed Companies have been steadily rising of late.

REVIEWS.

WALPOLE.*

IT is with very unaffected pleasure that we meet Mr. Morley once more in the field of literature, which, perhaps, it had been better for him if he had never left. We do not quite agree with a statement of his own that "controversialists" [by the way, though we know there is authority, if controversialists, why not smokers or bakists?] "cannot long retain their kindness for each other." Perhaps some very sharp passages between Mr. Morley and a certain quondam friend of his recently may be thought to exemplify it; but for some years now we have ourselves had occasion to speak very frequently and very uncompromisingly of Mr. Morley's public language and public conduct, and we are sure that we have retained our kindness for him, even if he has not retained his for us. There is little danger of disturbance of kindness in the present instance, for reasons which we have no space to discuss here, though the discussion might be interesting. The politics of the eighteenth century present but little civis dolosus even to hot-gospellers in the politics of the present day. It is still unsafe to handle the questions concerned in the great Rebellion, and not wholly safe to touch those of the Revolution. But Tories from the accession, or at least from the death, of Anne to the battle of Waterloo were so little like modern Tories, and Whigs of that period were so much less like modern Liberals, that there is very little danger of the thermometer running up too fast. Yet no period is more interesting, and in the period few figures are more interesting than Walpole's. With some rather ugly faults he had immense and peculiarly English merit. If not the greatest, we are inclined to think that he was the most satisfactory, statesman of the century. He was free alike from the incurable instability and insincerity of Bolingbroke, from the madcaperies of that genius manqué Carteret, from the grandiosity of Chatham, from the frigid goodboyishness of his son. The good deeds for which Macaulay praises him in reference to the funds and the price of corn, though solid enough, may not seem very interesting; we may think his aversion to war ignoble and pusillanimous (by the way, despite Walpole's moral fortitude, there are imputations, if we mistake not, on his physical courage, of which Mr. Morley says nothing); some of us, as Shippen said, may be for King James, while he was for King George. He was not only a libertine, which was between himself and his conscience, but a coarse-tongued and coarse-minded libertine, which is a very disagreeable thing, and, what was still worse, he was as indifferent to the honour of the women of his own family as he was reckless of that of others. But he was an honest man, a good fellow, a good patriot according to his lights, a farseeing statesman, a wonderfully able financier, and as a Minister and politician, whatever he was as a man, one of the boldest, wariest, most enterprising, most indomitable fighters in all history. And, above all, there was no nonsense about him, none of the sickening cant and phrasemaking and posturing and Pecksniffery which are so often the besetting sins of politicians, and which have particularly beset statesmen on what may be for shortness called the Liberal side. We rather agree with Mr. Morley that Walpole's "cynicism" has been exaggerated. Indeed, what is generally called "cynicism" is much more the fault of the Bolingbrokes than of the Walpoles, and is frequently as insincere as any other form of cant. But there was no sham or cant at all in Walpole. If he did not say that "every man has his price," he knew that the great majority of men, though not consummate scoundrels or utter fools, are frequently a little dishonest and constantly very silly. The modern cant of the party that calls itself his about "sympathy," "union of hearts," and so forth, would have made him not sick, for his stomach was too strong, but uproariously merry. Perhaps, on the whole, he took things a little too unheroically. But we cannot all be heroes, and we can all, if we choose, not be Pecksniffs.

We are glad to see that Mr. Morley's view of Walpole agrees on the whole very fairly with that which we have stated in the last paragraph. He naturally thinks better than we do of Sir Robert's particular acts of policy, and it would be quite possible to cross swords with him on some matters. What, for instance, is the use of throwing an offensive word like "conspirator" at Atterbury? If the valiant Dean was a conspirator, then those who invited William of Orange over were conspirators of the deepest dye. It is wiser for both sides to keep offensive names of this kind for undoubted cases, such as the Rye House or the Assassination business. And we cannot think that Mr. Morley has cleared Walpole of the charge of loading himself with the thick clay. His own figures tell the tale. But, on the whole, his sketch of the long and interesting drama of Walpole's life is singularly free from question-begging epithets or unsuccessful pleadings, and on more than one point he breaks away from predecessors on his own side. We do not, indeed, know that he has quite grasped the argument—indeed, few writers have—which justified Harley and Bolingbroke to some extent for their conduct to Marlborough, and which is conspicuously ignored in a passage eulogizing the "Junto" which he quotes from Burke. No study of that strange battle can be complete which omits to notice that it was the Whigs and not the Tories who began to break the understanding of a joint administration. We are quite at one with Mr. Morley on the question whether government by two parties could ever stand; we are sure that it never could. Walpole's great merit, as Mr. Morley of course points out, is, that he first resolutely and rigorously refused to have anything to do with the ingenious schemes of partnership which had deluded men like Halifax and Godolphin. But this does not make it any the less necessary to recognize that faith was broken with, not by, the Tory party, in the earlier years of Anne. Of those still more famous "four last years" Mr. Morley has much, but naturally nothing new, to say. We observe that, though he very confidently speaks of the communications of the Tory Ministers with St. Germain's, he is as unable as all other historians to tell us what it was from which the coup d'état of Argyll and Somerset saved the State, on what terms James III. was going to be brought back, by whom he was going to be brought back, and so forth. He writes one sentence showing that he knows that Marlborough was by no means unlikely to have gone Jacobite after all; and he writes another showing that he knows that Bolingbroke was up to the last in parley with the Whigs. Whether we shall ever know what was then brewing is doubtful. We suspect that Mr. Morley is not certain that anything was brewing at all; nor are we. On the Treaty of Utrecht, little as he likes its negotiators, he is quite sound, holding it to have been an excellent treaty for the country, as it certainly was; and, though perhaps here one may guess reasons, he is also much sounder on a long subsequent business, the Wood's coinage matter, than most party enemies of Swift (but Mr. Morley should not talk of Swift's "savage and unholy genius"; "savage" is only worthy of a schoolboy or a penny-a-liner who has Latin enough to construe sæva in the epitaph, and "unholy" is foolish). One point which tells in favour of the Drapier, and which has been missed by most writers, Mr. Morley misses too. If the bargain was an honest one on Wood's side, how could his losses on the sum coined have been honestly compensated by a pension of three thousand a year? The thing is impossible. On the Septennial Bill Mr. Morley obeys the wise advice "Glissez!" And there is nothing else to be done. The Septennial Act has worked very well in practice; but in its inception it was utterly indefensible. The Peerage Bill, of which he also says but little, is not so clear a case, and we should have liked some argument on it. But Mr. Morley probably cannot trust himself to speak impartially about the House of Lords. The story of Walpole's long tenure of almost sovereign power, and of the conspiracy (the word is in place here) which deprived him of it, is excellently told, and Mr. Morley has done very well to show that the supposed collapse of the defeated Minister is a vain imagination, and that he still exercised no small influence.

He has, we believe, written the whole book with studied fairness; but he has not been able to resist a few flings, which are vastly amusing; as thus:—

It was in conformity to the political notions of the time, as it is to those of our own time in relation to Ireland, to strike vindictive blows of this kind.

It is rather unkind of Mr. Morley to refer thus to Mr. Gladstone's imprisonment of Mr. Parnell; but, no doubt, he knows his chief best. And here again:—

As might have been expected, he resorted to a common device of embarrassed politicians; he called for a national party. The hypocritical phrase did not make his allies forget that it was he who had first insisted on drawing strict party lines and driving the Whigs out of government, any more than it prevented the revival, when power was once more within reach, of the acutest jealousies between the two wings of the patriot coalition.

This partakes more of miching malecho; but it is excusable. We find greater difficulty in excusing Mr. Morley for dragging in, and that not once only, references to the French politics of 1873-77. But it is, perhaps, natural, for we have always suspected that he takes a much keener interest in the politics of France than in those of England. It is interesting to find him an enthusiastic Handelian. He calls Handel "the one resplendent genius who soars above the prosaic level of that uninspired and uninspiring time." A fellow-feeling for another Handelian ought to have saved him from such an illiberal and unfounded hit as this:—

George III. did many shabby, cunning, and unscrupulous things, yet tradition is gradually coming to pass him off as a very honest gentleman.

The following, perhaps, he would have been more or less than human if he had not written:—

Pulteney, though he had seceded from the regulars of his party, supposed, childishly enough, that the virtue of Whig principles would remain in him if he continued to sit on Whig benches.

* Twelve English Statesmen—Walpole. By John Morley. London: Macmillan.

But it is to his credit that he should have ventured on so bold and transparent a reference to the nonsense about Bulgarian and other atrocities as this:—

When the country suffers itself to be swept by such stories as these, it ceases to be rigorous as to evidence and proof; the possibility of exaggeration and invention made no difference in the effect.

And so we may commend to readers a very interesting and excellent book. That Mr. Morley has, according to the common superstition, acquired any additional authority in writing it from the fact of his having sat in Parliament, or even from that of his having had the opportunity to luxuriate in the nectar and ambrosia (legend or history says this is dry biscuits) provided for Cabinet Councils we do not believe. But he is an accomplished man of letters, well acquainted with history; and, as it happens, his own pet weaknesses and prejudices interfere with this particular subject little if at all. Therefore he has written as good a book as, for the honour of letters, we could have wished him to write, and one which will, we hope, and believe, do him credit when he has long been disinfected of his association with the Gladstones and the Harcourts, the Laboucheres and the Jacobys, by the greatest of all disinfectants—churchyard mould.

NOVELS.*

THERE is no reason why a bright little story, whose author has decided to remain unknown, should have been called The County; but there is equally no reason why it should have been called anything else. The scene is laid principally in the well-known county of Loamshire, that favoured land of fiction; and the heroine and her very worldly sister, Frances, are "County people," and therefore very superior to all the other characters in the novel, who very decidedly are not. The book is written after the manner of Miss Broughton, only without the force and passion of that popular writer, and is perhaps more on a par with the later works of Mrs. Hungerford. The women are fair, pale, and flippant, the men big and foolish. The plot lies revealed in the first three chapters, and is of the old, familiar type. The lovely lady, poor and proud; the lover, adoring and huffy; the scheming sister, and the wealthy parvenu. Of course the lovely lady has a coolness with "the one man the world holds," and will not ask for an explanation of his conduct, or explain her own, and therefore marries the parvenu. Equally, of course, the hand of fate falls heavily on the miserable husband, and there is great rejoicing over his death. All this is de rigueur in a story of this stamp, and the charm of the book lies in the bright talk and amusing "frivol" of its characters. Frances Nugent is detestable, but she is distinctly amusing in her worldly wisdom:—

"You will find that smothering any little dawning fancy which may happen to trouble you is excellent practice for getting your heart well in hand. I"—with modest pride—"can speak from experience, as you know. Did I not tilt with my foolish tendresse for Lance Beresford and come off victor? And is not my heart—such as it is—perfectly ready to go with my hand when a fitting suitor presents himself? I remember"—with a shudder at the chilly retrospect—"that it was a bitter afternoon last March when Lance came to say Good-bye, and what quite decided me was the thought of coals. It struck me that upon 700*l.* a year one would have to economize in fires."

On diet such as this we are sustained throughout two volumes, the print whereof is large and the margins wide. It is all very light reading, of course, but there is nothing objectionable, except to those who read a novel from a serious motive. They will probably find that their sympathies are enlisted by the wife, who, though faithful to her husband in a certain sense, loves "another man twice as well," and that on account of this sympathy the moral of the story is not moral at all.

In Apples of Sodom we hear a good deal about music; and, taking a hint from the author, we may best describe the book by saying that it begins scherzando, continues andante capriccioso, and ends adagio religioso. The first part is the best. Marcus Brand, the head of his school, the captain of the school eleven, proposes to and is accepted by Jenny Fermor, a pretty, plaintive little person, who posed as a bereaved orphan, and perpetually "accepted slights and offered sacrifices which were by no means incumbent on her to offer, and then pitied herself for it." The young man's father sternly refused to sanction the engagement, and Marcus goes to Oxbridge, and remains there four years, during which time he never sees the plaintive Jenny, but does see very frequently Armine Constable, the bewitching clever daughter of a learned professor. At the end of these four years Marcus is by no means so enthusiastic about Miss Jenny Fermor as he had been on the day he left Harcheston school; but, feeling that he is in honour bound, he persuades his father to consent to a renewal of his proposal, goes down to Harcheston, finds Jenny prettier and more plaintive than ever, and recognizes that he would be "a brute" to forsake her. It is no mystery, however, that Armine Constable is the real "affinity." This being announced, we divine, with the prescience of the accustomed novel-reader, that Jenny's doom is sealed. But when and where does she die? Nothing shall induce us to reveal this, the more so as the author takes a new start from this point, with the indigestibility of "Apples of Sodom" as her text. We concur in the fact, and regret that from her point of view the sermon was indispensable. We confess that the self-confident Armine, with the caustic speech and artistic temperament, is more attractive to us than the remorseful lover; and, though it was doubtless very wrong of her to play the violin to him in such a manner as to make him feel "a little uncomfortable," it is very characteristic of womankind to waken "old memories from their sleep," and then be rather alarmed at the effect they have produced. The book, as a whole, is well written. The language is good, the periods well rounded, and the story, though somewhat spun out, is told with a definite purpose; but the writing is hard, clear, and cold as an east wind. Justice is in no wise tempered with mercy; and the standard of self-immolation is set so high that the sympathy remains with those who fail to reach it.

The charm that is wanting in Apples of Sodom is very vividly present in A Hardy Norseman. The book is eminently one suited to those good people who, living in the wide-spreading light of charity, are to our "faults a little blind, and to our virtues ever kind," but it is interesting to everybody. It is not given to every writer to make a work of this class interesting. There is generally too much "skip" about a novel in which religion plays a prominent part, and yet where no theological discussions arise. Edna Lyall herself does not always succeed, but on this occasion she has done well. Her characters live and move and have a being. We like their appearance, we take to them at once and sympathize with their joys and sorrows, their weakness and their strength. We renew also our acquaintance with some old friends of former works. Miss Edna Lyall is evidently as reluctant to say good-bye to Carlo Donati as were the readers of A Knight Errant; and Charles Osgood is as steadfast in good works as he was in the days of We Two. We are taken immediately on the opening of the story to "the land of the midnight sun," and introduced, while still on the steamer, to Frithiof Falck, the "Hardy Norseman," who had come to the landing quay of Bergen to receive and welcome his father's London correspondents. Frithiof was tall and broad-shouldered, with something unusually erect and energetic in his bearing; his features were of the pure Greek type, not unfrequently to be met with in Norway; while his Northern birth was attested by a fair skin and light hair and moustache, as well as by a pair of honest, well-opened, blue eyes, which looked out on the world with a boyish content and happiness.

Such is our hero, like a young bear with all his troubles before him. The troubles come soon enough, and are heavy enough to weigh down a braver spirit. The boyish content is swallowed up by the apathy of despair, and Frithiof's "dark hour" is dark indeed. It is in the description of this period of her hero's life that the author excels. There is no exaggeration either of virtue or vice; we are shown a human being whose sorrows make him hard and bitter, and whose traditions keep him honest. More than this, Frithiof is represented as speaking English perfectly, but in feeling, thought, and action he remains a Norwegian. We have many, but not too many, descriptions of Norway and the home-life of its simple people. Sigrid and Swanhild, Frithiof's sisters, are charming, and the history of their life in the "workmen's model lodgings," where they had four rooms for seven-and-sixpence a week, and furnished them for twenty-eight pounds, is full of interest. The first evening that the little family spend in their new home is thoroughly characteristic. Sigrid decides that, as they have to wait on themselves, they may as well get what fun they can out of it. So the tea-things being washed and put away, the boots cleaned, and the lamp lighted, the piano lent to them by a kind friend is opened, and Sigrid asks,

"What shall be the first thing we play in our new home, Swanhild?"

"For Norge," said the little girl promptly. . . . "Come and sing, Frithiof; do come," pleaded Swanhild, slipping her hand caressingly into his and drawing him towards the piano. And willingly enough he consented; and in their new home in this foreign land they sang together the stirring national song.

For those who feel interested already in Frithiof Falck we may add that the love of a good woman is his reward after much tribulation, in the course of which he learns to recognize that every heart has its own romance, and, whether living in the fierce glare of a palace, in the whirl of society, in a quiet London suburb, or in an East-End court, it is all the same. The details differ, the accessories are strangely different, but the love which is the great mainspring of life is precisely the same all the world over.

What a terrible thing is a sporting novel badly written! A little hunting sandwiched in between two thick slices of heavy love-making. Mrs. Edward Kennard adds mustard to this compound in the shape of liberal abuse of that wretched thing called Man; but the piquancy of salt is conspicuous only by its absence, and the severest form of literary hunger, known as "Nothing else to read," would be needed to make this book acceptable. The Matron "might have been some five or six-and-thirty years of age, and was in many respects a remarkable-looking woman. Her beauty, though on the wane, was still striking in spite of a certain undefinable coarseness and voluptuous maturity which, in fastidious eyes, detracted somewhat from its charm." This woman's character and conversation match her appearance, and the combination is very unpleasant. Beaumont Dornay nevertheless loved her in the days when he was a gay young soldier of one-and-twenty and she was a widow of thirty; but he was poor, and she lost her fortune if she married again, so they agreed to wait. He went to India with his regiment, and she set to work to save. She evidently practised great economy, for out of an income of 7,000*l.* a year she not only put by 40,000*l.* in five years, but lent to her lover sums amounting in all to nearly 4,000*l.* And yet when the ungrateful one returns from India, and she awaits him with her mature heart beating tempestuously, he only thinks that she has grown quite fat and coarse-looking, wonders how he could ever have admired her, and—accepts another cheque to buy hunters with. In company with a friend, a lovelorn swain with a huge appetite, Beau Dornay betakes himself and his hunters to Fieldborough. He no sooner arrives, than he falls in love with Miss Dolly Dalrymple, and, after ten minutes' acquaintance, entertains her in this manner:—"I hope you don't wholly set your face against admirers, Miss Dolly—I beg pardon, I mean Miss Dalrymple—for men as a body would be desperately badly off if all the nicest, freshest girls refused to have anything to say to them, and took horses and dogs to their hearts rather than husbands. Not but what," he added lightly, "I daresay, the former are preferable, and give less trouble." In this wise the "Maid" is wooed and won, but not without a struggle. She speaks severely to the impetuous young man:—"Really, Captain Dornay," she said with that reserve which modest girls know so well how to assume on occasion, "your language is as incomprehensible as it is extraordinary. I must remind you that you are no longer in India, and that however you may talk to the young ladies over there, English ones are not accustomed to quite the same free-and-easy style of conversation." There is a grace and delicacy in these remarks that would inspire any man with respect for the fair speaker. Her philosophy also is full of refinement, and consists of unreasoning abuse of men in general and young men in particular. The conceit, the selfishness, the abnormal appetite of the lords of creation are freely commented on with the virulence peculiar to Mrs. Edward Kennard. All men are vile, and a duke is the most vile. His Grace of Jockland is described as "a short, stout young man, with a dull eye and an unhealthy complexion, sandy hair, and an ape-like head, which betrayed a good many more animal than intellectual propensities." This one-eyed nobleman eats and drinks enormously, and dies of delirium tremens. If Mrs. Kennard reproduces in her books people that she has seen and known, we must condole with her on her unfortunate experience; if, however, they are, as we would fondly hope, only imaginary beings, we would suggest that in her next book she should try to think of something less material and repulsive.

THE GEOLOGICAL RECORD.*

THE first volume of this valuable work has already been noticed in these pages; with the present one the Record of Papers on Geology and Mineralogy published between the years 1880 and 1884 is completed. Obviously it has made a late appearance; for in a very few weeks there will be another full period of five years, in regard to which geologists would gladly receive information. But the old proverb of "not looking a gift-horse in the mouth" applies here, and the editors are more deserving of praise for what they have done than of blame for the delay which has in no small part been due to unforeseen causes. To many workers, especially those most devoted to original research, the labour of compiling catalogues and wading through a mass of literature, not always either interesting or valuable, is peculiarly distasteful; so that the lion's share of a work of this kind generally falls to a few men whose time already is largely occupied with other duties which they cannot afford to neglect. More than once, indeed, it has been rumoured that the Geological Record would cease to appear; but we trust that the present issue will receive from geological students a welcome sufficiently hearty and liberal to encourage its editors to bring the work up to date and continue it in the future.

To criticize a book like this would require something very like geological omniscience, so we shall not attempt the task, but content ourselves with indicating the field covered by the present volume. The former one contained a list of the papers relating to stratigraphical and descriptive geology. The plan originally followed of giving brief abstracts of most of the papers noticed has been abandoned, and in the two parts of the present issue merely the titles of the papers or books, with the necessary references, are printed, a few explanatory words being added in a very limited number of cases, where the titles alone might give insufficient information. This second part contains a list of the papers &c. (published during the same period of five years) which relate to the following subjects:—Physical Geology, Applied and Economic Geology, Petrology, Meteorites, Mineralogy, Mineral Waters, Palæontology, General Geology (this being practically the receptacle for works which cannot be ranged under any special heading), and, lastly, Maps and Sections.

The work, as now completed, indicates the rapid increase in the amount of geological literature which has occurred during recent years. If we select for comparison the volume for 1875, the second in the series (and we choose this in preference to the first volume, because the latter in a publication of this kind is necessarily rather tentative and imperfect), we find that it consisted (including the index, &c.) of 416 pages, while the present work contains in all 989 pages. But in the former, as abstracts of the papers cited are inserted, the numbers of titles on a page is rather more than six, while in the latter it is about fifteen. Thus the one contains about 2,600 titles, the other about 15,000, which gives an average of 3,000, or an increase of 400 for each year between 1880 and 1884 inclusive. This approximation is a very rough one, because to attain anything like accuracy, owing to the inclusion of cross references and similar difficulties, would require a very minute analysis, and entail a large amount of thoroughly useless labour; but it probably gives a fair indication of the growth in this department of scientific literature.

It is also interesting to note, as we turn over the pages, that those who have attained to a considerable position among geologists exhibit a marked difference in their productive powers. For instance, if we compare the entries under the names of two men of about the same age and position, we find that in this period of five years the one has published more than forty papers, the other, at most, seventeen; thus their productiveness is very nearly in the proportion of eight to three. Yet the conditions under which their work has been done are seemingly similar, and in this respect, if there be any difference, it is not in favour of the more productive author. Another point of interest will be found in the indications afforded as to the catholicity or exclusiveness, so far as regards geology, of different authors; one man ranges over a wide field, and publishes papers upon various parts of it, while another, who writes about as frequently, restricts himself to a limited portion of a single department of the science.

A list of titles can hardly be expected to entertain, however much it may help the student. Still, a few of those quoted in this volume may be reckoned as belonging to the light literature (in one sense of the epithet) of geology. For instance, two or three commemorate those efforts to prop up dubious theology by unsound science to which the Victoria Institute has been wont to offer a cordial welcome, efforts which still linger on like the apteryx in favourable and sequestered localities. A paper on Eophyllum canadense, a supposed fossil from the Laurentian limestone, reminds us of the singular vagaries of an author who appeared to be endowed with a power of detecting organic structures in the most improbable of rocks, and to be quite equal to proving that a girder of the Forth Bridge was a fossil seaweed. Mr. Cope Whitehouse, that most pertinacious of imaginative reasoners, asks his favourite question, Is Fingal's Cave artificial? Mr. Ignatius Donnelly discourses on "Atlantis, the Antediluvian World," a title which recalls the poetic infancy of geology when facts were few and fancy was free; while to that on "Ragnarok, the Age of Fire and Gravel," the compiler has been unable to refrain from adding a brief descriptive note. "The drift is accounted for by the impact of a comet's tail, which caused one side of the world to be suddenly deluged with meteoric débris." These enlivenments, however, are very rare; the book, as a rule, is severely utilitarian.

THE HISTORY AND ART OF PHŒNICIA.*

WITHIN the last few years the political history and the art of the chief cities of the Phœnician coast have taken a very prominent position in the study of classical archaeology. Many recent discoveries have contributed to show how great was the influence of Phœnician art on that of the early Greeks, partly through the actual contact of the two races in many of the island settlements, such as Cyprus and Rhodes, and also by means of the widely extended trade of the Phœnicians, whose daring sailors carried westwards the beautiful objects in glass, bronze, and the precious metals which were produced with such wonderful technical skill by the craftsmen of Sidon and Tyre, and were so eagerly bought by the Hellenic and other races along the shores of the Mediterranean Sea.

It is interesting to note how close was the analogy between the position occupied by the rich trading city of Tyre with regard to the Southern countries of Europe and that of the city of Venice during its mediæval period of greatest glory. Both Tyre and Venice were island cities; both were, above all things, famed for their wealth in ships and the wide extent of their commerce, reaching from east to west of the great sea. Both cities acted, as far as their art was concerned, as links between the East and West, the Phœnician city introducing the forms and symbols of Assyria and Egypt among the Western inhabitants of Southern Europe, while Venice brought the mosaics, the metal-work, and the marble-lined architecture of Byzantium to both shores of the Adriatic. Even in minor details this parallel holds good; Tyre and Venice were both in their time the chief centres for the production of rich textiles and elaborately ornamented glass-work. The words used by Isaiah to describe the Phœnician Tyre might have been applied nineteen or twenty centuries later to the city of Venice—"She has been the mart of nations . . . the joyous city, whose antiquity is of ancient days, whose feet carried her afar off . . . the crowning city whose merchants are princes, whose traffickers are the honourable of the earth."

* History of Phœnicia. By George Rawlinson, Camden Professor of Ancient History in the University of Oxford, and Canon of Canterbury. London: Longmans & Co. 1889.

Phœnicia is one of the most interesting and archæologically instructive among all branches of ancient history; and Canon Rawlinson, in producing this convenient handbook on the subject, has added another to his long list of services to the science which he has for so many years striven to advance, both by his printed books and by his lectures as the Camden Professor of Ancient History at Oxford.

In his first chapter Canon Rawlinson gives a very vivid description of the country of the Phœnicians and the physical peculiarities which so much influenced the lives and history of its inhabitants. The mother country of Phœnicia is a mere strip of coast-land, about three hundred miles long, and averaging little more than fifteen miles in width. On the west it is bordered by the sea, and on the east by the fine mountain ranges of Lebanon and Carmel, well wooded with noble timber and watered by various torrents, which are of considerable volume in the winter months, but during the dry summers shrink into insignificant shallow brooks. This narrow strip between the mountains and the sea was, as Canon Rawlinson writes, "a tract of a remarkably diversified character. Lofty mountain, steep wooded hill, chalky slope, rich alluvial plain, and sandy shore succeeded each other, each having its own charm, which was enhanced by contrast." On the whole, however, the Phœnician plains seem not to have been remarkable for their fertility, and to some extent the population of the great Phœnician cities—such as Sidon, Tyre, Aradus, and Berytus (modern Beyrout)—were dependent on imports of grain and oil from the richer soil of their neighbours, the Jews, or the Egyptians, between whom and the Phœnicians a brisk trade was kept up for many centuries. Thus, when the Hebrew King Solomon desired to build his magnificent temple and royal palace at Jerusalem, Hiram, the friendly King of Tyre, was glad to supply timber of all kinds, fir-wood, cedars from Mount Lebanon, and skilled artificers in all crafts, in exchange for large supplies of corn and oil, of which the Jews were able to produce a far larger quantity than was needed for their home consumption.

In the Book of Kings we have a very interesting and detailed account of this great commercial transaction; and the minute description of the magnificent temple which the Tyrian workmen constructed in Jerusalem is of unique interest to the student of Phœnician art from the fact that, in spite of its being built for the purposes of a quite different religion, it was clearly, both in general plan and in the details of its ornament and construction, purely and simply a Phœnician building—such a temple, in fact, as might have been erected in some Phœnician city for the worship of the god Baal, who, in many forms, was the chief of the Phœnician hierarchy. The large open courts, the rows of small chambers for the priests, the two pillars Jachin and Boaz, were all characteristic parts of a Phœnician temple. The very symbols and ornaments which were so lavishly introduced in carved wood and in plates of beaten gold were all borrowed from a cult which had no relationship with the nobler monotheism of the Jews. The palm-trees between the winged cherubim, which must everywhere have met the eye of the Hebrew worshipper, were among the favourite religious symbols of the Phœnicians, though this special symbol really originated with another and artistically more original race—namely, the Assyrians, in the great Valley of the Euphrates. The Phœnicians, in fact, though a people of much artistic taste and unrivalled for their technical skill in most branches of art, were not remarkable for their originality in inventing new forms of ornament. This want of invention we find in some of the most beautiful and highly-finished works of Phœnician art that exist—the bowls in bronze and silver which in the course of trade were carried to Egypt, to the islands of the Ægean, and to the Etruscans of Italy, and were eagerly bought up by these very different people. In these beautiful pieces of metal-work we see side by side, skilfully worked into the same decorative band, the strange deities of Egypt, the great conqueror Rameses II., and the sacred tree with its guardian cherubim, together with other hieratic forms which were peculiar to Assyria. And yet the general design of the whole and its exquisite refinement of detail is purely Phœnician, and in point of technique is superior to anything that either Egypt or Assyria could have produced.

Among the many arts for which this wonderful people were so justly famous none was, perhaps, more exclusively associated with the Phœnicians than the art of dyeing with the brilliant Murex purple. Canon Rawlinson gives a very interesting account of the various shell-fish from which the purple was obtained, and the methods employed in giving to wool or silk this most gorgeous of all dyers' colours. Several different species of molluscs, varieties of the Murex and the Buccinum or Purpura, secrete in a minute sac a portion of purple dye. This extraordinary secretion, the use of which to the animal is still a mystery to the naturalist, as long as it remains in the sac of the mollusc has no indication whatever that it will yield a purple dye—"the colouring matter is a liquid of a creamy consistency, and of a yellowish white hue. On extraction, it is at first decidedly yellow; then, after a little time, it becomes green; and, finally, it settles into some shade of violet or purple." In this respect the process of dyeing with the Murex resembles that of the indigo vat, in which no tinge of blue or any colour is visible, but in a few moments, under exposure to the air, a cloth dipped in the solution of indigo turns a strong blue in a very mysterious and striking way. In order to get the deepest shade of purple, such as in later times was reserved for the use of the Byzantine Emperor, it was necessary to dip the stuff at least twice into the Murex vat, and Canon Rawlinson points out that the use of two different varieties of molluscs was requisite to produce the most brilliant and lasting shades of purple—"it was necessary that the dye obtained from the Buccinum should be used after that from the Murex had been applied. . . . The actual tints produced from the shell-fish appear to have ranged from blue, through violet and purple, to crimson and rose. Scarlet could not be obtained, but was yielded by the cochineal insect."

This last statement is not perfectly correct. The cochineal insect is peculiar to America, and so was not used in the Old World till the sixteenth century A.D. The insect dye which was so important for the weavers of classical times was the Kermes or Coccus, a little beetle which lives on the ilex oaks of Asia Minor, Greece, and other Southern countries. The Kermes affords a more beautiful and much more lasting scarlet than the cochineal; and to its use a great deal of the beauty and brilliance of old Oriental carpets and rugs is due. Unfortunately the Kermes beetle is difficult to collect, and even in Oriental countries its use is now becoming rare, partly owing to the import of cheap and inferior Western dyes.

Another art in which the Phœnicians were quite unrivalled was that of glass-making. The city of Sidon especially was famous for the manufacture of those elaborate little bottles, shaped like miniature Amphoræ, examples of which are found in Greek, Assyrian, and Etruscan tombs. These beautiful little bottles, made usually of deep blue glass, ornamented with zig-zag enamel bands in green and yellow of jewel-like brilliance, seem to have been used to hold precious perfumes. How very highly they were valued by the Greek and Etruscan races is shown by the very beautiful and elaborate little stands of pure gold which the purchasers of these bottles made to hold them. In some cases they are topped with little caps of gold, and no existing examples of Greek or Etruscan jewelry are more delicate and graceful than the gold mounts which were made for these gem-like little bottles.

Canon Rawlinson also points out that, according to a rather obscure passage in the elder Pliny's work (Hist. Nat. xxxvi. 194), glass mirrors backed with a sheet of polished metal were made by the Sidonian glass-workers. No example has yet been discovered of such a mirror, though polished silver-plated mirrors are among the commonest objects found in Greek and Etruscan tombs. It is, however, probable that in these ancient mirrors the glass was only used as a loose cover over the polished surface, in the same way that a framed picture is protected. The modern method of fixing an amalgam of lead and mercury to the back of a plate of glass was probably not invented before the thirteenth century A.D. One of the earliest passages in which this invention is referred to is that in the Divina Commedia (Par. II. 89), where Dante speaks of the moon's rays being reflected

Così, come color torna per vetro,
Lo qual diretto a sè piombo nasconde.

In addition to the interesting sections on the geography, art, and existing remains of the Phœnician people, Canon Rawlinson gives a very valuable and highly condensed summary of the History of Phœnicia and the westward growth of its colonization. One very remarkable characteristic of this branch of the Semitic family is their wonderful recuperative power after the most fearful devastation and slaughter had ravaged their land at many different periods, from the time of Esarhaddon in the seventh century B.C. down to the utter destruction of Tyre and the wholesale slaughter of its male inhabitants by Alexander of Macedon in 332 B.C. None of the many tragic stories of ancient times is more thrilling than that of the heroic defence of Tyre during a seven months' siege, with not only the army of Alexander as their assailants, but even a navy of Phœnician ships from their own Cyprian colonies ranged on the side of their enemies. So strong was the position of Tyre on its rocky island that, without the aid of traitors among the Phœnician race, it is doubtful whether Alexander, with all the help of his gigantic moles of masonry and powerful siege implements, would have been able to subdue this stubborn Semitic resistance. The Phœnicians were like the modern Turks in this respect, that, though not specially skilled at fighting in the open, they were the most heroic defenders of a walled city. They knew not only how to fight, but how to die; and, rather than yield to the Macedonian conqueror, the men of Tyre gave themselves up to certain slaughter, well knowing that no mercy was to be expected from the proud and savage spirit of Alexander, excited to wild rage by his unwonted check before the walls of this little sea-girt citadel.

On the whole, Canon Rawlinson has given us a work of great interest, in which is condensed a very large amount of otherwise scattered information. It is to be regretted that, in his chapter on the Phœnician remains of Cyprus, and especially at Paphos, he has not made use of the results of the recent excavations which have been carried on under the auspices of the British School of Archæology at Athens. A perusal of the Report of the Cyprian excavators would have saved Canon Rawlinson from the reproduction of General Cesnola's very misleading statements with regard to the plan of the temple of the Paphian Aphrodite, and many other important points connected with the archæology of the Phœnician cities in the island of Cyprus. Canon Rawlinson's work is, on the whole, well illustrated, though some of the woodcuts of coins are, unfortunately, copied from old and very inaccurate representations.

THE ANNALS OF NATAL.*

MR. BIRD has selected a somewhat novel method of writing history; he has determined to let history speak for itself. With the exception of a short introduction there is no particle of matter that comes from his pen in these two bulky volumes; they are simply and frankly a compilation of documents already in existence. To the general reader in search of information, the prospect thus offered is not altogether pleasing. Few in this age of hurry will find the patience necessary to the task of reading and sifting many scores of old despatches, journals, lectures, letters to newspapers, and what not; indeed to some it will seem that a more primitive fashion of bookmaking could not have been invented. And yet it has striking advantages, at least to that rare person the conscientious student of the beginnings of nations, and, in this instance, will have yet more to the future historian of South Africa. We could indeed have wished that Mr. Bird had felt himself equal to the task of weaving the substance of this enormous mass of information into a clear and consecutive narrative, quoting where it was proper to quote, and commenting where comment was desirable. But the qualifications necessary to the undertaking are many, including as they do personal and lifelong knowledge in addition to literary and other gifts. The first of these Mr. Bird has, indeed, for he has spent a long life in South Africa, and many years of it in the service of the Natal Government, but we know of one living man only who possesses them all. Why does not Sir Theophilus Shepstone give the world a history of the country and the peoples with which he is better acquainted than anybody can be again?

For the rest we have nothing but praise to give to Mr. Bird's book. With untiring industry he has sorted out, and where necessary translated from the Dutch, very many documents which were hitherto either unknown, or buried from sight in Record Offices and libraries. Thereby he has let a flood of light upon the dark places of the early history of Natal and Zululand—from the Christmas of 1497 when Vasco da Gama and his party by "the mercy of God which in these cases consoles with calm weather . . . on the day of the Nativity passed by the coast of 'Natal' to which they gave that name," till the final establishment of the Queen's authority in 1845.

By far the most interesting part of the compilation under review is that which deals with the history of the Zulu and kindred peoples of the Bantu race. There is no more striking instance in history of the enormous power sometimes wielded for good or evil by a man of genius than that which is afforded in the career of T'Chaka, the first Zulu king. Before 1812, at which date the peaceful period of these tribes may be said to have come to an end, their life might almost be called idyllic. As Sir T. Shepstone points out in a paper printed in these volumes, quoting the native words, "the sun that saw tribes fight never set till their quarrel was ended." The quarrels were purely family ones. In the main men lived at peace with each other; they traded food, they married early and often, they were happy and they died. Then arose a colossal genius and most unequalled fiend, T'Chaka, the Lion of the Zulu, and all was changed. He stalked on to power, perhaps the most absolute that was ever wielded by man, through a flood of crime and bloodshed which the imagination can scarcely grasp. Tribe after tribe went down before him, many never to rise again—for they were exterminated. One instance will suffice, that of the tribes living in Natal. What they numbered is not known, probably over half a million souls. T'Chaka broke upon them and their happy, quiet life. Soon all that remained were scattered remnants of starving wretches, hiding in rocks and caves, subsisting on roots, some of them so poisonous that those who ate of them became mad, or uniting into troops of cannibals who "hunted for human beings as men hunt for game."

As to whence came the Zulu race in its origin these volumes have little to say. Mr. Fynn, however, suggests a cautious inference in the evidence given by him before the Native Commission of 1852, which should stimulate the flagging spirits of the searchers for the lost tribes. He believes that the Kafir people have occupied a superior position in the past, and points out resemblances between their customs and those of the Jews, among which the following are the most prominent:—War offerings, sin offerings, propitiatory offerings. Festival of first-fruits. Share of sacrifice to be given to the Witch doctor, who answers to the Jewish priest. Periods of uncleanness, on decease of relatives, or after touching the dead. Circumcision. Rules as to chastity, and unlawfulness of eating flesh of swine. It is generally supposed that natives of the Zulu race are by nature particularly bloodthirsty and cruel. Of this there is little evidence. That the tyrants who rule them are cruel is true enough; but then cruelty is a characteristic of tyrants. Their subjects also show little mercy when on the war-path, it is not their custom to do so, and if they did, a distorted view of their tenderness might be taken by those they serve. But on the whole they are a kindly people rather than otherwise. For instance, their penal code will bear comparison with our own of a century ago. Treason, desertion, poisoning, witchcraft, are punishable with death and confiscation; murder, cattle maiming, and administering love philters, with death or fine; adultery and rape with fine, and sometimes death; arson, maiming, and false witness, with fine; and theft with restitution and fine. To the Bantu people also belongs the credit of having invented a family system which, although it runs counter to our ideas, works almost to perfection. They practise polygamy, not the unwholesome polygamy of the Eastern, but an open-air variety of the custom which leaves complete liberty to the women, a liberty that it is scarcely too much to say is never abused. As a result of this system vice and unmarried women are practically not to be found among the uncivilized Zulus and kindred tribes. Neither, and this seems strange, is jealousy common among the wives, who treat each other as affectionate sisters. "I have many mothers," a Zulu will say; "all my father's wives are my mothers." M. Delegorgue bears witness to this in his Voyage dans l'Afrique, quoted in these pages, and experience proves that his conclusion is scarcely overdrawn. He says:—

A Kafir may have from one to fifty wives; he often has ten. His home breathes peace. There is no instance of a husband or a head of a household striking one of his wives. A mother does not know that white women allow themselves to slap their children; nor do they understand the possibility of a woman in health giving up her suckling to be nursed by another. They attach importance to devoting themselves to the end of maternal duties, the severe tasks of which they take a pleasure in increasing and prolonging; their children are neither wayward nor tearful; they grow rapidly, and soon become firm and valiant.

The result of this custom of polygamy is a vast and rapid increase of the population—that is, in South Africa, not elsewhere. So long as the increase was counterbalanced by the ravages of war this mattered little; but it is difficult to conjecture what the issue will be in Natal and British Zululand now that war is put a stop to and famines are prevented. It is curious to observe the alternating fortune which has followed these people. In the far past they must have won their way south with war and struggle. Then came a long period of rest and peace, in turn to be succeeded by the terror inaugurated by T'Chaka, which, in the case of the inhabitants of Zululand, terminated little over a year ago. Now there is peace once more. In Natal it has already endured for forty years, and during that time the population has quadrupled. What will come after the peace when the land will no longer hold its multitudes? The colonists cry out for the abolition of polygamy, which they rightly hold is the root of the evil. But there is only one way to do this, by exterminating those who practise it; for the Zulu has little craving for a monogamous existence, which—so greatly do the opinions of mankind vary on this matter—he considers improper and immoral. It is a most interesting question; but we cannot follow it here.

With the outlines of the early history of Natal most readers will have some acquaintance. The country which T'Chaka swept with his besom of destruction was occupied by a handful of adventurous Englishmen, to whom he granted it in the year 1824. This did not, however, prevent other grants being made of the same land, notably that by Dingaan, T'Chaka's successor, to Retief, the Boer leader. Subsequently to the occupation of Natal by Englishmen, the Boers, dissatisfied with the emancipation of the slaves by the Home Government, trekked from the Cape Colony in 1836 to find a new home far from the British flag. In due course they came into contact with the Zulus, then ruled over by Dingaan, T'Chaka's brother, and there followed a series of sanguinary combats and massacres. Retief and his company were treacherously slaughtered by Dingaan in February 1838, immediately after receiving from him a grant of Natal to be their "everlasting property." Following on this massacre, Dingaan despatched impiis, or regiments, to make a sweep of the emigrant farmers, and some five hundred people were slain, including many women and children, in the Weenen district of Natal. The name Weenen, or "weeping," commemorates their slaughter for ever. Thereon the Boers, collecting their forces, and assisted by Panda, the brother of Dingaan and T'Chaka, fell upon Dingaan, and, by the help of their firearms, defeated him in several battles with great carnage; till in the end they drove him to a miserable but well-deserved death in Swaziland, and established Panda as his successor. After this event the emigrant Boers took possession of Natal, and declared their independence, which, subsequently to its accustomed vacillations, the Home Government declined to recognize. In 1842 Captain Smith was accordingly ordered to occupy Natal with a small body of troops. The results were disastrous. Captain Smith was defeated by the Boers at Congela, and, together with his force, was reduced to great extremities, till in the end relief arrived under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Cloete. Finally, Natal became British territory, and the majority of the emigrant Boers trekked over the Drakensberg to dwell in the South African Republic, where, as this generation of Englishmen has bitter reason to know, the story was to be repeated in due course, with even more disastrous results to the honour of our name and flag. It may be interesting to quote here the opinion of the Rev. G. Champion, an early missionary in Zululand, as to the characteristics of the Boer race. On the 9th April, 1838, he writes:—

As to the Boers, I am not yet prepared to say what I think about them as a field of labour. God is making use of them as a scourge of the natives; and perhaps when they have accomplished this, they will be the mutual scourges of each other. Their ignorance, their parties, their ungodliness, make it improbable that they can unite in any good form of government. Far less are they prepared for independence than the worst of the South American States.

There is truth in this, though the truth admits of qualification. If only successive English Governments would have recognized that in South Africa they had a great opportunity and a duty to fulfil, the history of that country would not be what it is to-day, a long record of bloodshed and blunders and, for us, of national humiliation. It is not yet too late. Although in our wanton folly we have thrown away the richest portion of the richest country in the world, a country that before many generations are over may surpass Great Britain itself in wealth and importance, although in their terror of responsibility our party leaders have time on time truckled and shuffled and run away, dragging our flag into the dirt and making our name a mockery to black and white—it is not yet too late. Circumstances have befriended us, little as we deserve it. Much still remains to us, and much may still be regained. And yet will it be regained? Will not the Colonial Office still cling to its ancient policy, of which the certain fruits are disaster and disgrace? Even now we hear rumours of an intention to surrender Swaziland to the Boers. They seem incredible; but with past examples before our eyes, with the Transvaal gone and Zululand dismembered—who shall say that they are not true? And if they are true; if in the face of prudence, policy, and profit these things are to be done, and that by statesmen of the Conservative party, what is there more to say? Let us fold our hands once more and practise resignation, a virtue of which the people of this country have latterly stood much in need. Meanwhile we recommend all who would form an opinion as to the future from the teachings of the past to carefully study Mr. Bird's elaborate historical compilation.

CROMER, PAST AND PRESENT.*

TO narrate the history of a parish possessing no particular historical associations in such a manner as to make a readable book is a task of no ordinary difficulty. Those personally acquainted with the locality will probably care to possess the volume, whether it be interesting or not; but even they will scarcely have the patience to read through a congeries of antiquarian lore, unless it be digested and presented to them in a form capable of easy assimilation. Yet the history of even the most insignificant place which has possessed a continuity of separate existence for several centuries must necessarily contain a good deal that is attractive to the general reader, and much more that is instructive to the student of men and manners. A mere guide-book, dealing only with the present aspect of things, will not afford this; it is necessary to go beneath the surface, to exhume long-forgotten scraps of information, to piece them together, and thus re-forge from materials insignificant in themselves the broken chain of story which connects the present with the past. Many a side-light will be thrown upon the general history of our country; many an institution now fallen into oblivion will afford evidence that our ancestors exercised and enjoyed a measure of local self-government which we flatter ourselves that we are now creating for the first time. When Guilds flourished there was no Poor-Law and no need for one. Each craft or mystery looked to the honesty and fair dealing of its members without the necessity of an Adulteration Act; the Homage of the Manor acting in Court Leet was an effectual equivalent for Petty Sessions, while the Hue and Cry against offenders efficiently anticipated the services of the County Police.

Mr. Walter Rye's Cromer, Past and Present, besides being a complete monograph of that place, is issued as a sample of his projected History of North Erpingham, the hundred in which Cromer is situated. Of this projected work Mr. Rye has already laid the foundations by printing some years ago a considerable amount of "Rough Materials" for the history of this hundred. He found that it was impossible to carry in mind the contents of a mass of un-indexed notes, and he therefore wisely ventured on a new departure in topography—namely, to print and index all his material first, just as it came to hand, and then to begin to write his history under separate parishes. The present volume, built on this sure foundation, may be regarded as a corner-stone of that History of Norfolk which some future historian of the county will, by reason of Mr. Rye's labours, be very much more easily and surely enabled to construct. Mr. Rye's method is as exhaustive as the industry of one single individual can well be expected to employ. It is scarcely necessary to say that he has gone in every instance to original sources for his information; he asserts that this is the first history of any parish in England to contain (1) Notes of every Inscription in its church and churchyard; (2) Notes of every Foot of Fine; (3) References to every will; and (4) Transcripts of every Subsidy Roll and Poll Book which relates to the parish. Nearly half of the volume, consequently, consists of these matters in full detail, relegated very properly to a series of appendices. That his readers will wade through this mass of names even Mr. Rye himself can hardly expect; but there they are, brought together by patient toil, and available for reference to all future time. The few who have occasion to consult them will certainly be grateful for the diligence which has placed them on record; the many, who have no such interest, should at least appreciate the labour spent upon them.

The derivation of the name of Cromer Mr. Rye seeks to account for by his favourite theory, true enough in many instances, that most Norfolk villages took their names from reminiscences of the homes of Danish or Norse settlers. To this particular instance the theory seems singularly ill adapted; for, even on Mr. Rye's own showing, the name does not emerge for two centuries after the Conquest. Along this sandy Norfolk coast, exposed to the full force of north-easterly gales, with no land between it and the North Pole, the North Sea has sliced away many an acre of good ground. Some villages, and even towns, have partially, some have entirely, disappeared from the map. To the east of Cromer, Eccles Church, half buried in sand, stands on the present sea-beach, whilst so much of the parish has been washed away, that it has been found necessary to annex the remnant to its adjacent neighbour. Still further down the coast, Dunwich, once the largest city in East Anglia, and even in the time of Edward I. populous enough to contribute eleven ships of war to the defence of the realm, has now dwindled to an insignificant village. Off Cromer the sea now rolls over the lost town of Shipden, and the remains of its church tower, known as the "Church Rock," are a danger to fishermen. Whether Shipden and Cromer were identical or were two separate places, and, if so, which was which, Mr. Rye is unable to determine, but at any rate there were two separate churches. In Domesday only the name of Shipden occurs, that of Cromer first appearing in 1262. A hundred years later we hear of the merchants and fishermen of Cromer, but as late as 1426 the fair and market were renewed under the name of Shipden. Towards the middle of the fifteenth century the form Shipden, alias Cromer, appears, and Shipden by itself gradually falls out, and finally disappears altogether. Under one name or the other the place carried on a considerable trade during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. It was governed by bailiffs of its own, just as Norwich and Yarmouth were until they exchanged the title of their chief municipal officer for that of mayor. Fishery was naturally the principal business of the Cromer traders, but the Patent Rolls show that they also exported corn, falcons, gold, and silver, and that their imports included salt, timber, coal, pitch, oil, and wine. To Robert Bacon, a mariner of Cromer, is ascribed the re-discovery of Iceland for trading purposes; and the same bold seaman is said to have captured James, son of Robert, King of Scots, while driven ashore near here by stress of weather, in 1405, on a voyage from Scotland to France. Considerable sums were spent by the inhabitants in making and endeavouring to maintain a pier for the protection of ships in their haven; Richard II. granted to them the right of levying certain duties for five years on all merchandize coming into their port, in aid of such a pier. John Sparks, in 1483, left a legacy to place great stones to form a breakwater against the pier; in his will he refers to his cottage, called "Blobberhous," which Mr. Rye thinks may indicate that there was some whaling going on from the place. Mr. Rye quotes twenty-three other wills from inhabitants who left money towards "the reparacon of the fabric of le pere." Cromer furnished to London two Lord Mayors, who did not forget their native place; the first, William Crommere, left a legacy towards gilding its high altar; the second, Bartholomew Rede, who was a great goldsmith and Lord Mayor in 1502, founded the free school here, still managed by the Goldsmiths' Company. In 1528 no less than thirty trading ships are mentioned as coming from Cromer. In spite of all the money spent upon it the pier had in Elizabeth's reign fallen into decay owing to the "rages and surges of the sea," and that Queen granted Letters Patent to the inhabitants to export 20,000 quarters of corn for its repair, a privilege the exercise of which led to considerable litigation. During the seventeenth century the trade of Cromer gradually fell off, its decay being accelerated by the ravages of Dunkirkers and Dutchmen; pier after pier was washed away; even a lighthouse, built in 1719, had to be replaced in little more than a century by one built further inland. Mr. Rye gives us glimpses of affrays with smugglers, and even of wrecking, during the last century; before its close the port had entirely disappeared, though a small beaching trade in coal and timber was carried on until late years; now even that has been knocked on the head by the opening of the railway, and nothing remains to represent its former commercial glories except lodging houses and Cromer crabs. As a watering-place Cromer has been frequented for about a hundred years, and until quite recently it enjoyed the charm of being undisturbed by any railway. It seems to have been brought into repute by the Norwich bankers, the Gurneys, an acquisitive and prolific family, of whom Mr. Rye records that in 1793 two members, a brother and sister, had between them twenty-two children who used to stand in a row on the shore. The same clan still throng the beach, and, with the allied families of Barclay, Birkbeck, Hoare, and Buxton, form a sort of close corporation, holding almost exclusive possession of this quiet watering-place. A pedigree, showing some of their intermarriages, is inserted by Mr. Rye as an ethnological curiosity. It also affords an opportunity for Mr. Rye's favourite pastime of breaking a lance with pedigree-makers; he pours out the vials of his scorn on the "Record of the House of Gournay," in which the late Daniel Gurney sought to connect his Norwich ancestors with the knightly family of Norman descent formerly resident in the Eastern Counties. The old landed families that once owned the four different Cromer Manors, whose descent is traced by Mr. Rye, have died out, or left the neighbourhood. The de Weylands, Pastons, and Arnolds of early days disappeared long ago; the Wyndhams and Windhams—no relations to each other—of more recent years, have also gone, and their very names are hardly remembered. Even the church now contains but few memorials of the former lords of the soil, though the coat-armour formerly in the windows and elsewhere, of which contemporary records happily exist, must have been of great interest. The church is worthy of the full and well-illustrated description which Mr. Rye has lovingly devoted to it. Erected on the foundations of an earlier edifice, it is a fine specimen of Early Perpendicular work with a tower of singular beauty, built of that squared flint-work, so well adapted to resist the disintegrating effects of the salt-laden blasts of the North Sea. The striking uniformity of the general design shows that it was all the work of one mind; while elaborately ornamented stone-work, let into the flint, with endless variations never exactly repeated, gives richness and diversity to the whole fabric. Formerly, as is evidenced by repeated bequests in old wills cited by Mr. Rye, the church was rich in shrines and chapels, each devoted to some saint or to the uses of some guild. These were swept away by the Reformation; and the chapels, no longer wanted for their original purpose, were suffered to fall into decay. The chancel was unfortunately blown up, for want of means to repair it, in 1681; but the present inhabitants have nobly come forward with large sums for its restoration, and the profits of the volume under review are to be added to the fund for this purpose.

PROFESSOR J. COOK WILSON'S EXPLANATION.*

THIS pamphlet of one hundred and forty-five pages is one of those pieces of personal polemic which will, we suppose, from time to time be written and published, but for which it is to be wished, in the interest not least of their authors, that they may be as soon as possible forgotten. To notice them is an ungrateful task; but when, as in this case, the position of the assailant and the assailed will secure for the dispute some passing notoriety, silence is useless and may be misleading. And so we must say our say.

In the Classical Review for March 1889 was published a hostile review by Professor Wilson of the edition of Plato's Timæus by Mr. R. D. Archer-Hind. The review was not merely adverse, but, according to the strict and distinctive meaning of the words, a hostile review. It impugned not only the views of the editor as an exponent of Plato, but also his character as a man. We ask particular attention to this point, because it is vital. It was alleged that the editor had endeavoured to obtain credit for originality in respect of work which was not his own, and this not rarely or inadvertently, but constantly and on purpose. It was also alleged, but incidentally rather, and as subsidiary to the other charge, that the editor habitually depreciated his predecessors. We are trying at present simply to state an issue; and we are sure that Professor Wilson (whom, once for all, we entirely acquit of dishonesty or bad motives) would not deny that he made and makes these allegations.

Now this charge is a moral charge, the gravest, perhaps, which can be laid against a man in the quality of a scholar. It is always held, and the life of a student would be intolerable if it were held otherwise, that between such a charge and any dispute on matters of knowledge or opinion the line should be firmly drawn and strictly kept. Accordingly, it is not surprising that the editor in his answer (Classical Review, April 1889) distinguished the accusation from the objections in the broadest possible way, by replying to the accusation only. He denied the charge with indignation, and denied also that there was any evidence for it, taking one or two specific illustrations to show what sort of evidence was alleged. The present pamphlet is a rejoinder to this reply.

Now, as we understand, it is not contended by the critic that the editor in his reply selected unfair or disadvantageous specimens of the evidence. He adduces in this pamphlet much fresh matter of the same kind as the original, but he also replies to the editor with complete confidence on the chosen issues. It seems to be agreed therefore, and certainly it is our own opinion, that these cases are fairly typical. We will consider one of them.

Mr. Archer-Hind introduces his note on Plato's theory of respiration with the following remarks (p. 291):—

An important light, however, is thrown upon it [the theory] by a fragment of Galen's treatise on the Timæus which deals with this passage. This fragment, which was previously known only in an imperfect Latin translation, was found by M. Daremberg in the Paris Library, and published by him in 1848. On Galen's commentary the ensuing explanation is based: I cannot, however, persuade myself that it fully clears up statements which Galen himself declares to be δυσνόητά τε καὶ δύσρητα.

Thereupon the critic accused the editor of "giving the reader the impression that he has done a piece of original and meritorious research," and again in this pamphlet complains of "the appearance of originality and discovery which the editor contrives to give his notes here." Now, before touching any details, let us ask where in the above passage the editor makes any claim to merit at all? Does he claim to have given the true explanation of Plato? On the contrary, he thinks the explanation inadequate. Does he claim that the incomplete explanation, so far as it goes, is his own? The "important light," he says, comes from Galen. Does he claim to have first called attention to the document? He implies that attention was directed to it by M. Daremberg. What is the "meritorious" and "original" thing which the editor claims to have done? Here is the objection of the critic:—

All that [the editor] gets out of the Greek [of Galen] is equally clear in the Latin, which is not here defective. All that he rightly gets out of it, and even the illustrative woodcut (a little altered), is already given in the note and translation of the edition used (Daremberg's), to which no acknowledgment is made. We can hardly think that the editor has read the Latin: his mistake about it may come from a remark of Daremberg's.

That is to say, the editor does not mention that M. Daremberg, when he published the original Greek of Galen's Commentary, also translated and annotated it; the editor writes "published by him in 1848," and not "published by him with a translation and commentary in 1848"; and the critic would have us believe that this was done with design, in order that the editor might claim originality for getting the explanation out of Galen. Now we would ask Professor Wilson, who is a good and acute reasoner when he gives his mind fair play, to consider calmly this simple question:—If Mr. Archer-Hind had this object in view, what could possibly induce him to mention the name and publication of M. Daremberg at all? Professor Wilson says (and it is part of his grievance) that, for the purpose of this passage, the Latin translation of Galen would have done equally well. If then Mr. Archer-Hind had not mentioned the publication of the Greek, this supposed theft from M. Daremberg might actually have been committed, and this might have been done with perfect security and without any chance of conviction. We are almost ashamed to point out a consideration so obvious; and we are something more than ashamed that, upon evidence of which this is a not unfavourable specimen, one English scholar of high standing should have attacked the reputation of another. From the critic's elaborate statement (eleven pages long) of the facts concerning this matter we gather the same general impression as from the editor's brief summary, that Galen's explanation of this passage is not entirely satisfactory, that any one who paid attention to Galen's commentary might know what Galen's explanation was, but that, as a fact, until the publication of the Greek by M. Daremberg, little attention was paid to Galen's commentary, owing to the general defectiveness of the Latin translation. The real service of M. Daremberg, in relation to this particular passage, appears to have been exactly that which the editor ascribes to him; but if it were otherwise—if, in reality, Mr. Archer-Hind could not or would not have read the commentary as he does, without the assistance of M. Daremberg's notes—it would still be manifestly absurd to hold that he intentionally misrepresented a service which it would have been easy and safe to ignore.

It is not a little curious, and well illustrates the wearisome futility of these captious controversies, that neither the critic in his review, nor the editor in his reply, nor the critic again in his pamphlet, makes a perfectly proper representation of the note about which all this pother is raised. The quotations stop at the word "based," omitting the rest of the sentence, which, nevertheless, deeply affects the general colour of the statement by showing that the explanation which follows does not content the editor, and therefore that he cannot have wished to claim particular "merit" in connexion with it. Mr. Archer-Hind, it is true, was at liberty to omit the conclusion of the paragraph if he pleased, since it makes for him; but Professor Wilson should have quoted every word, and the more so as he comments bitterly upon other omissions in the editor's quotation of the note, founding upon them fresh charges of dishonesty. We found no charge upon Professor Wilson's omission; it is a mere oversight, and not important; but it is every bit as important as the average of Professor Wilson's evidence.

To follow the pamphlet in detail we have neither space nor inclination. Speaking broadly, the only part of it which seems to us material and effective for the present purpose of justifying Professor Wilson's personal attack is Part I. § 2, in which the critic shows without difficulty that the editor sometimes speaks with blamable depreciation and asperity of his predecessor Stallbaum. This is true; and it is also true (as we observed ourselves in our notice of the edition) that Aristotle, whom the editor does not like, is cited and criticized not always in the tone which is desirable. To point this out once for all would have been just; though we cannot refrain from saying that the reprimand would have come better from almost any other preacher. But this is the sum of the editor's offending, and it might have been dismissed in one sentence. The attempt to make a case against him out of his relation to the French commentary of Martin (of whom he speaks with positive enthusiasm) is to us altogether incomprehensible. And with regard even to Stallbaum it should in fairness be added that the great learning and industry of Stallbaum, which the editor acknowledges, are combined with certain qualities less valuable and less pleasing, which, as Professor Wilson himself admits (p. 7), have caused his general reputation to be less than it ought to be. Where many have been unfair, Mr. Archer-Hind, who in matters of like and dislike is not a guarded writer, has rather exaggerated than corrected the error. And that is the whole of the matter.

As to the mass of the pamphlet, it is the common staple of criticism and controversy; some of it is acute, some of it is interesting, but it contributes nothing, so far as we see, to the justification of Professor Wilson for the tone of his review. Certainly some plain mistakes are pointed out; there are mistakes, and bad mistakes, in every book; but there is no proof whatever of such negligence or of such ignorance as may properly be considered a literary offence. Indeed, considering the position and reputation of Mr. Archer-Hind, we are inclined to apologize for saying so.

Meanwhile, neither in the review nor in the pamphlet have we yet any adequate criticism at all upon that theory respecting Plato's philosophical purpose in the Timæus, which, as he who runs may read, is the only part of the editor's book to which he attaches much importance. Nor is there any praise for the translation, which, if it had twice as many errors as the critic tries to make out, would still be, in our judgment, a beautiful piece of literary work. The philosophical criticism, we understand, is still to come and may still be useful. But Professor Wilson may be assured that, unless he can altogether change his manner, nothing that he writes about this particular matter will have that weight which his place and abilities ought to command. "A nemesis," as he truly says, "attends this treatment" of an adversary in debate. How far he is at present qualified for judging impartially the work of Mr. Archer-Hind may be estimated from the following instance. In the original review he charged the editor with an elementary mistake in Greek accident upon "circumstantial evidence" derived from a comparison between one of the notes and another book. This "evidence," which occupies three pages of the pamphlet, was not stated at all in the review, and could not possibly be guessed from it. The editor by way of reply simply reprinted his note, and it is difficult to see what else, assuming him innocent of the blunder, he could be expected to do. Under these circumstances Professor Wilson now (p. 139) actually tries to distinguish between the form of the editor's protest and a point-blank denial that he made the mistake!

We have only to repeat once more that we make no accusation against Professor Wilson. He is an able man, and we have no doubt that he has come honestly by his convictions. When he is ready to believe the same of others, he will have begun to be a trustworthy critic.

THEATRICAL LIFE IN FRANCE.*

NOT without some grudging and heartburning can an Englishman contrast with the flood of light that illumines the French stage the meagre information he possesses with regard to that of his own country. At the outset there is comparatively little of which to complain. Pepys is a more intelligent, if a less voluminous, commentator on stage doings than Loret, whose Muze Historique covers a period—1650–1665—almost the same as that of the Diary. Colley Cibber and Steele are admirable chroniclers and critics; and, with regard to later days even, the famous Account of the English Stage of Genest is worth every stage history the French possess, from the elaborate analysis of the brothers Parfaict to the pleasing summary of Hippolyte Lucas. No such influence over the general life of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries as was exercised in France by the stage is, however, perceptible in England. The figure of Garrick is brought prominently before the public in the works of Johnson, Goldsmith, and other great writers of his epoch. In France from Voltaire to Collé everybody in the eighteenth century busied himself with the stage. An actress, when persecuted by a nobleman, sought refuge with the Sage of Ferney; when censured by a critic, appealed to the throne. Appointments to the Comédie Française were decided in State Councils, and refusal to sing at the Opéra was dealt with by a lettre de cachet. French literature overflows with descriptions of actors and their doings, and the task of writing history from dramatic and histrionic records has in France been more than once accomplished. Up to present days the same thing has prevailed, and the actress may almost be regarded as the tutelary goddess of France.

In his Idols of the French Stage Mr. Sutherland Edwards gives biographies of French actresses, principally belonging to the eighteenth century. He opens in the previous century with a life of Armande Béjard, the wife of Molière, and at the close of his second volume he supplies sketches of Rachel and of Mme. Sarah Bernhardt. The remaining lives, however, belong to the eighteenth century, and principally, indeed, to that period of theatrical activity that immediately preceded the Revolution.

To the English reader most of the information Mr. Edwards supplies will probably be new. It is, so far as the facts are concerned, fairly trustworthy. The volumes are, however, defaced by an almost incredible number of misprints. Occurring as they do principally in French words, these mistakes are especially unfortunate, seeing that they encourage the heresy sometimes heard from Frenchmen that our ignorance of French is commensurate with their ignorance of English. A few of them are indicated in a Table of Errata, which, however, only appears in connexion with the first volume. In this table are noted such preposterous errors as "cete" for cette, "noins" for moins, "Ju" for Qu', and "abbés" for abbés. In the first quotation, however, from Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme are two mistakes which render speeches unintelligible; and when one of these is corrected (?) in the Errata another error is substituted for that indicated. This occurs on the eleventh page of the first volume, and from that time forward there are few consecutive pages without a serious mistake, while accents are thrown about almost at random. That Mr. Edwards is responsible for the inaccuracies which abound in his volumes is not to be supposed. He owes, however, to himself as well as to his reader a more careful supervision.

In the chapter headed "The Wife of Molière" Mr. Edwards gives an account of several actresses belonging to the troupe of Molière, and incidentally of Molière himself. With no mention of the doubts that have been cast upon his view, he speaks of Armande-Grésinde-Claire-Elizabeth Béjard, to give her her complement of names, as the sister of Madeleine Béjard, and does not even mention that, in spite of the statement of the marriage act of Molière, discovered in 1821 by Beffara, a relationship even closer—that of mother and child—has been assigned them. The dishonouring and infamous accusations of the Mémoire pour le sieur Guichard (1676), which calls Mlle. Molière "orpheline de son mari, veuve de son père," and the accusations of Élomire hypocondre (1670) and other works, are, perhaps wisely, unindicated. Quotations are, however, made from La fameuse Comédienne, in which the worst charges are supported.

It is seldom well to rake up buried scandal, if only for the fine reason advanced by Sir Thomas Browne that records of past offences are likely to embolden timid minds to imitation or repetition. The lives of eighteenth-century French actresses constitute, however, one constant record of intrigue, and to separate the stage triumph from the social career is impossible. In words quoted by Mr. Edwards, Rachel contrasts the good housewife who, troubled with domestic affairs, is an old woman at forty, and the actress who preserves her juvenility, having "no pre-occupation except in connexion with art and love, two fountains of youth." "But," continues Rachel, "I am almost copying Brantôme, for it is he who says 'Live like the rose. The more a flower is cultivated, the longer it lasts.'"

The longest life Mr. Edwards supplies is that of Sophie Arnould, the most interesting that of Mme. Favart, which necessarily includes some account of her husband. For these and for the biographies of Adrienne Lecouvreur, Mlle. de Camargo, Madeleine (sic) Guimard, Mme. Dugazon, Mme. de Saint-Huberty, and Mlles. Clairon, Contat, and Raucourt, abundant materials are furnished from sources English as well as French. In addition to the contemporary memoirs and recollections, MM. de Goncourt, Arsène Houssaye, and others have diligently collected particulars concerning these princesses or goddesses of la rampe. In the short and not too satisfactory account of Mlle. Clairon of Mr. Edwards, which is principally occupied with her own story concerning her ghostly visitations, one or two of her noble letters written to Garrick, and included in the second volume of his correspondence, might with advantage have been used.

Nominally a vindication of himself, the Behind the Scenes of the Comédie Française of M. Arsène Houssaye is, in its present form at least, a life of Rachel. From the four delightful volumes of Les Confessions, published four years ago, Mr. Vandam has taken enough to make one substantial volume. This will, perhaps, be adequate to the requirements of the English reader, who has to accept a rendering all unlike the original of the criticisms, the descriptions, the anecdotes, and the indiscretions of M. Houssaye. One thing, however, the translator has preserved—the faith in Romanticism and its high priests by which M. Houssaye is inspired, and the profound homage he paid to Rachel, are everywhere apparent. To Rachel he owes his appointment to the direction of the Comédie Française; she is his buckler against the assaults to which he is constantly exposed, and almost the final pages of Les Confessions are occupied with a vindication of the actress in a short wrangle between her and M. Legouvé.

That the intimacy between M. Houssaye and Rachel was good for both admits of no doubt. In their manifold discouragements, neither of them occupying a bed of roses, they turned to one another for support, and seldom failed to find it. Indulgent to her caprices, proud of her genius, and devoted to the enhancement of her fame, he was a counsellor on whom she could always rely, a friend who never failed. On the other hand, she had only to hear a hint that his resignation was imminent, and no Minister was safe from her pursuit.

For the great institution the fortunes of which he directed during seven years M. Houssaye has the warmest admiration. His imposition upon the actors, who had determined to manage their own affairs, was keenly contested and fiercely resented. If ever, accordingly, any man was in a position to know what anger may be cherished in celestial bosoms, it was he. When he entered upon his post the institution was practically moribund. The last balance showed a deficit for the year only of over a hundred thousand francs to be added to the debt weighing on the establishment. So neglected were the representations that the greatest company of actors in the world had played to fifty-three francs. The cashier of the company meanwhile declared himself unable to indicate "a single method by which the management could obtain a loan of ten thousand francs even for a single hour." A firm adherent of the Romantic school, M. Houssaye called to his aid its chief lights, Alexandre Dumas, Victor Hugo, Alfred de Musset, Théophile Gautier, and so forth. The opposition of the actors, who upon his entry served him with an injunction to abstain from exercising the functions of director, was with some difficulty confronted and overcome. When the sociétaires threatened to leave the Comédie en bloc, he simply bade them go, promising to fill their places from the pensionnaires, who at that time included Got, Monrose, Delaunay, Mme.

Favart, Mlles. Théric and Luther. Mme. Arnould-Plessy was coming back from Russia. Bressant, Madeleine Brohan, and Mme. Doche were within reach, and the company he vowed should be further recruited from other houses by Frédéric, Bocage, Mélingue, and Rouvière. It is needless to say that the schemes of secession melted into thin air, and that not a single actor fulfilled his threat. Before long, indeed, the majority was on the side of the director. Samson and Beauvallet and others of the company were dramatists as well as actors, and their plays were in the same category as those of Viennet, Empis, and Mazères, with whose services M. Houssaye was anxious to dispense. Strong as he was, the new director was not able wholly to banish the old school of dramatists. Very far is he from supplying a record of the pieces produced during his tenure of the direction. This, however, is obtainable elsewhere. Not a few of the pieces in question are by members of the company and others who were thrust upon the management. A leaven of high-class literature is, however, seen from the first. Louison, by Alfred de Musset; Adrienne Lecouvreur, by Scribe and Legouvé; François le Champi, by George Sand; and Gabrielle, by M. Emile Augier, were all played during the first season. Charlotte Corday, by Ponsard; Le Chandelier, by Musset; Les Contes de la Reine de Navarre, by Scribe and Legouvé, were among the triumphs of the second. Without giving a complete list of pieces of importance played during the new management, a few works of importance may be mentioned. These comprise Bataille de Dames; Les Caprices de Marianne of Musset; Mademoiselle de la Seiglière; Diane, by Augier; Le Bonhomme Jadis of Murger; Sullivan, by Mélesville; Lady Tartuffe, by Mme. de Girardin; Le Lys dans la Vallée, taken from Balzac, by Th. Barrière; Mauprat, by George Sand; La Pierre de Touche of Augier and Jules Sandeau; La Joie fait Peur; Péril en la Demeure, by Feuillet; and Par Droit de Conquête, by Legouvé. The result of this change of programme was immediately perceptible. On the nights when Rachel did not act the receipts were not always satisfactory, and Rosemonde, by Latour de Saint-Ybars, in which the goddess herself appeared, was a failure. As M. Houssaye points out, however, the revival under his management was instantaneous and lasting. At the close of the first year, instead of a deficit, there was a sum of one hundred thousand francs to divide among the sociétaires. His vindication is, indeed, complete, and when, under the influence of a wave of reaction, he had to yield the reins to M. Empis, actors and actresses were as eager to retain his services as they had previously been to dispense with them.

It is needless to say that the story is brilliantly told, and is illustrated by penetrative criticism, lively anecdote, and vivid portraiture. Not a few of the most prominent figures of the middle of the century are painted to the life, and their relations and proceedings are depicted with a fidelity that in some cases goes far beyond indiscretion. Mr. Vandam's translation is fluent and accurate, but a little too familiar. His notes are few and excellent. In this case, also, the mistakes in French are numerous. They are obvious printer's errors—Haléry for Halévy, Legier for Ligier, and so forth—but are none the less deplorable.

HORACE WALPOLE'S LETTERS.*

SUCH a lucky-bag of varied prizes is Walpole's delightful correspondence that it should not be a difficult matter to make an attractive selection from its pages. But it is not by any means equally clear that Mr. Charles Duke Yonge is the properest person to prepare such an anthology, still less to edit it. A writer who, in his introductory pages, passes typographical eccentricities like "the Chancellor Maupéon" and "Marino Faliere" fails to inspire that initial confidence which we desire to feel in a fresh cicerone. Nor are we reassured when, upon further prospecting, we come upon "Tassom" for "Tassoni," "pansen" for "panser," and "Vandreuel" for "Vaudreuil." No doubt these lapses will be laid to the count of the much-enduring printer, although they should hardly have escaped the author of a History of France and biographer of Marie Antoinette. But what are we to say to "Lady Mary Montague" (more than once), and "Mr. George Coleman"? Furthermore, what does Mr. Yonge mean by talking of Mme de Sévigné's letters to her daughters? One would think it sufficiently notorious that the much-adored Mme. de Grignan had no sisters. If we turn to the matter more especially in hand, Horace Walpole himself, Mr. Yonge seems equally to seek. He is obviously under the impression that the Memoirs of George II. and George III., given to the world by Lord Holland and Sir Denis le Marchant, were published during their author's life-time, and he writes as if he thinks that they, as well as the Castle of Otranto and the Historic Doubts on the Life and Reign of Richard the Third, were issued from the Strawberry Hill Press. His critical judgments are as remarkable as his facts. He is of opinion, with regard to certain of Walpole's works, that "not one is devoid of merit," and that two of them, the Royal and Noble Authors and the Anecdotes of Painting, "are full of entertainment, not unmixed with instruction." Also that the Mysterious Mother is "admitted to rank high for vigorous description and poetic imagery." This is quite in the worshipful vein of Johnson's "Dick Minim." But how shall we characterize the announcement that Gray is "hereafter to achieve a poetical immortality"? And what is Mr. Yonge's authority for saying that Macaulay was "unfit to shine at the tea-table of fashionable ladies"? Our own impression, fortified by recent consultation of Trevelyan's Life, is, that, wherever there was an audience, Macaulay was fitted to lead it captive, and that it mattered little whether he spoke at a tea-table or a dinner-table.

As regards Mr. Yonge's editorial notes, it is difficult to divine upon what principle they have been compiled, beyond that venerable one known as à propos de bottes. If the first object of notes is to afford adequate enlightenment to the bewildered general reader, then certainly Mr. Yonge's do not attain this standard. Occasionally they are compiled from Cunningham, with variations of Mr. Yonge's own—as, for example, when he turns "Dodington," which is right, into "Doddington," which is wrong; sometimes they are taken verbatim from Wright, without that formality of acknowledgment which Cunningham accords to him. Sometimes they are wholly superfluous, as when we are treated to a description of Walton's Angler; sometimes in part, as when we are apprised that Boswell was "Dr. Johnson's celebrated biographer." They are strongest where the editor is strongest, upon points of history, and especially French history and biography, which are seldom allowed to pass. Thus, while the note about Miss Chudleigh is brief, there is a long one about Mlle. Clairon; and, although Garrick's first appearances pass without comment, there is more than a page of small print on the Mariage de Figaro of Beaumarchais, a fact which significantly suggests that Mr. Yonge is, above all, the historian of the Bourbons, and that

One science only will one genius fit;
So vast is art, so narrow human wit.

This limitation or partiality is regrettable, because in more than one case annotation is absolutely required. We could forgive Mr. Yonge for attempting to betray us into the belief (vol. ii. p. 294) that Miss Seward was the author of the riddle on the letter "H" if he had only made some sign of disapproval—were it but to have transcribed Scott's admirable note on the subject—at Walpole's abominable comments (vol. ii. p. 56) on Swift's relations with Miss Vanhomrigh. For such an editorial protest we would willingly have sacrificed an entire essay upon Brunehaut or Mme. de Boufflers.

It would not be difficult to add further examples of Mr. Yonge's editorial shortcomings. Indeed, upon occasion, he himself is not unwilling to admit them. In a letter to the Miss Berrys, dated June 1791, Walpole speaks of "Hannah Bonner, my imprimée." The explanation is obvious. Miss More had written a poem called Bishop Bonner's Ghost, which Walpole had printed at his private press in 1789. Yet Mr. Yonge annotates:—"Miss Hannah More is meant; but I do not know what peculiar cruelty of temper or practice entitled her to the name of Mary's persecuting and pitiless bishop." Upon such an utterance comment is needless. Mr. Yonge, in short, has had an excellent opportunity and missed it. A skilful and discriminating selection from Walpole's letters, accompanied by notes frequent enough to smooth all difficulties, and brief enough to be unobtrusive as interruptions, would have been a real boon to many, since Cunningham's excellent edition, although it is not exhaustive, is in nine closely-printed volumes. With his allotted space (two octavo volumes) and his clear and readable type, Mr. Yonge might have given us a charming Christmas present. His neglect to do so is the more to be deplored because his process illustrations of Strawberry Hill, and some of his portraits, particularly those of Horace, of his father (after Simon's mezzotint), and of Gray, are really creditable as illustrations.

ILLUSTRATED GUIDE TO CAMBRIDGE*

MESSRS. JARROLD'S Illustrated Guide to Cambridge, by a Resident M.A., is a handy little volume, packed full of facts, with some coarse illustrations and the most illegible map it was ever our ill fortune to meet with. Cambridge, as the author points out, was originally a Roman station on the left bank of the Cam, and a good deal of the square enclosure can still be traced, though we are somewhat sceptical as to the "entrenchments thrown up by the Roundheads while occupying Cambridge" which, we are told, are to be seen near Castle Hill. The name of the river, by the way, is probably not the Celtic "Cam" (crooked), the root which appears in the name of the River Camel in Somerset, but has grown out of the word "Cambridge" by a mistaken etymology, as though the name of the town meant, "The bridge over the River Cam," whereas the syllable "Cam" probably contains, in a corrupted form, the name of the Anglo-Saxon (si fas est dicere) tribe who had here their burh. The ancient name of the river was undoubtedly "Grant." Under the head of "Fairs" we find an account of the once famous Stourbridge Fair, now a pathetic shadow of its former self; but no notice of Midsummer Fair, or of how Midsummer Common acquired its name. Pain Peverell, Robert Courtheuse's standard-bearer in the Holy Land, is duly mentioned as the founder of Barnwell Abbey; but, as most readers of guide-books have not the Duchess of Cleveland's Roll of Battle Abbey at their fingers' ends, we think it would have been well to add that he is supposed to have married the daughter of the Picot who built Cambridge Castle, and that when FitzPicot forfeited the great Honour of Brunne in Cambridgeshire, Peverell obtained it, and founded Barnwell Abbey, into which he introduced thirty monks, according to the years of his age at the time. Camden, in a passage which no Cambridge guide-book should omit to quote, tells us how Peverell "obtained a grant of Henry I. of a spot of ground without the Borough of Cambridge: in the midst of it were extraordinary clear fountains or wells, called Barnwell, that is, the wells of children or barns; for young men and boys met here once a year, upon St. John's Eve, for wrestling and the like youthful exercises us'd in England, and also to make merry with singing and other musick. By this concourse of boys and girls, who met here in sport, it grew to be a custom for a great many byers and sellers to repair hither at the same time; and it is now commonly call'd Midsummer Fair."

The clear fountains now are all choked with mud, the trees by the river-side have all been cut down, and the meadows are a prey to the speculative builder; but we are glad to learn that the Cambridge Antiquarian Society has taken what remains of the abbey under its protection. We do not altogether think that architecture seems to be the strong point of the "Resident Trinity M.A.," judging from the unqualified admiration which he expresses for Wilkins's work at Corpus Christi College, for the new buildings at Pembroke, which have been chosen for one of the illustrations, and for the "handsome" west portal of St. Mary's; not to mention his description of the florid new Divinity School as "Early English," while the "Marguerites" and other devices on St. John's Gate are worked in plaster, not in stone. Wisely, perhaps, he declines to decide as to the derivation of "Petty Cury," which is the name of one of the principal streets of the town; though for our own part we have little doubt that the latter word is the same as that which we find in the Forme of Cury, a cookery-book of the time of Richard II., and that the street, like the "Rue Malcuisinat" in Jerusalem under the Frankish Kings, was in mediæval times the street of the cookshops. His style of writing is not always clear, as for instance:—"Queens' Lane is part of what was formerly, under the name of Milne Street or Millestrete, an important thoroughfare, running parallel to High Street, called afterwards Trumpington Street and University Street, right across the present site of Kings, past Clare and Trinity Hall, to Trinity, which it thus connected with Silver Street"; or "St. Edward's church . . . has been the auditorium for Chas. Simeon, and earlier, no less a one than Latimer." In his account of Madingley we read that "the Hall . . . has a fine bit of old college gateway at the stables." It is a pity that the "Resident Trinity M.A." does not tell us to what college it originally belonged. The brick and stone church which stands north and south on the Newmarket Road is Christ Church, Barnwell, not St. Paul's, as stated. Finally, though the writer speaks of Hobson and his conduit, he does not spare a word of description for one of the pleasantest features of Cambridge—the watercourses which run through its two principal streets. Still, in spite of various shortcomings, the book contains much information which will be of value to visitors and residents alike.

NEW MUSIC.

MESSRS. ENOCH & SONS send us No. 1895 of "Collection Litloff," being a pianoforte Album of "Morceaux Célèbres, par P. Tschäikowski." It is a charming collection of pianoforte compositions of the thoroughly Russian or Polish genre which has become so deservedly popular ever since the days of Chopin. These works demand a certain amount of technique, and are to be recommended to those who like brilliant music, above the average of the ordinary drawing-room fireworks. Enoch's "Dance Music," No. 4, is a capital shilling's-worth, very useful for its purpose, and has been well selected; as is also No. 2 of the Kindergarten series, a compendium of easy dance music. No. 3 of the same set is called the "Children's Sacred Wreath," and is a simple collection of sacred songs and hymn tunes suitable for quite young children. A waltz called "Little Gleaners," by Otto Roeder, is printed in one of the largest music types that we have ever seen; the subject matches the type, being both simple and clear. The same can be said of the waltz, "Fiddle and I," founded on Goodeve's popular song of that name. Most of the other music sent to us by Messrs. Enoch is printed in the same type, and for that style of music, which it is often necessary to play at sight, nothing can be more legible and clear. "Eldorado," also a waltz, by T. Popplewell Royle, has the same merit. A comic song, by Joseph Roeckel, called "On the Zuyder Zee," is sparkling, and strongly to be recommended as not being in the least vulgar. Another song of his, "The Prima Donna," is a sensational song, which we do not so much like. "You Sang to Me," by Milton Welling, is pathetic and pretty. "Babylon," a sacred song by Michael Watson, is one of the class modelled upon Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Lost Chord" (what a host of songs he is responsible for!) There is always a dramatic ring about them that makes them popular. "Little Lord Fauntleroy," a song also by Mr. Watson, is of average merit. "Thy King," by Paul Rodney, is a sacred song of an effective character. A pretty, unpretentious song, although not above mediocrity, called "Our Summer Moon," by Frank L. Moir, brings Messrs. Enoch & Sons' list to a close.

Messrs. E. Aschenberg & Co. send us a collection of "Handel's Choruses" for organ, with pedal obbligato arranged by Henry Smart. In many respects it is a satisfactory work; but we should like several great choruses that have been omitted to be inserted; perhaps there are other volumes to follow. In one particular we entirely object to the work—namely, the way in which some of the choruses are mangled and only parts given. For instance, there is only the last part of the chorus "We never will bow down," beginning at the words "We worship God alone," given, whereas the splendour of this last part entirely depends upon the grand contrast with the first, this being a point in which Handel is particularly great.

From Messrs. Marriott & Williams comes a collection of songs, music by Ferris Tozer, entitled "Oceana; or, Echoes from Afloat." They are a set of very ordinary simple songs, rather pretty, but nothing in the music, except perhaps the last four-part song, savours of the sea.

Messrs. Woolhouse & Co. send a valse, "Thoughts of Home," by Fred E. Parsons, arranged for military band by Dan Godfrey, Jun. We need not say that under his hands it is all that could be wished of the kind. The clarionets take the principal part, and there is a good deal of unison amongst the instruments; it is a pretty valse, well suited for a wind band. We have an "Intermezzo," by G. Saint George, Op. 23, which apparently is arranged in many forms, our copy being for piano and violin. It shows his accustomed suavity and simplicity of style, and ought to be very acceptable to performers who have not acquired any great proficiency.

Messrs. Reynolds & Co. send a "March of the Champions," by Felix Burns. It has a great deal of go in it, so much so that we wish some of the parts to be played in polka time to dance to. "Danse Américaine," by George Asch, we suppose must be of the schottische genus. It is very graceful and taking, and for a work of the kind is above the average in originality. "Coraline," Intermezzo, by Theo Bonheur, is chiefly remarkable in the first subject for the strong resemblance to the "Air de Louis XIII." which appeared some few years ago; the other parts of the work are even more hackneyed, although reminding us of nothing in particular. "Maypole Revels," by the same composer, is very suggestive of its title, and we should recommend it to those who wish to practise triplets with the right hand, combining, besides, a certain amount of tunefulness. "Sunny Spain" is a song by Oscar Vane, better suited for a valse than for a song; it does appear in this form, arranged by J. Warwick Moore, and is decidedly bright and pleasing. "Out in the Storm," by Cuthbert Vane, is one of those so-called dramatic songs which give great scope for variety and are so much in vogue. This one gives opportunities for representing a storm, the calm that follows, safety, and the almost inevitable prayer; in its way it is effective.

CHRISTMAS CARDS AND BOOKLETS.

THE Christmas card has probably been sufficiently developed; the Christmas booklet appears this season to be enlarging its borders in several respects, and may be said to have a future. Both descriptions of these seasonable offerings are issued in abundance and variety by Messrs. Hildesheimer & Faulkner, whose publications this year are marked, as heretofore, by excellent printing, mounting, and harmonious colours. The cards are designed by adepts in the art, and those who yearn for novelty will find it chiefly in the forms of the cards. Here we have a "Happy Hand"—a pair of gloves; a child's worsted socks, cleverly simulated; a pair of boots; flowers, foliage, or fruit; a handbox, and other ingenious devices, the majority of them with verses by Mr. F. E. Weatherley thrown in. Mr. Ernest Wilson's landscapes are charming. Miss Alice L. West, whose decorative borders and drawings of birds are admirable; Mr. Charles Robertson, who is associated with Mr. Harold Wilson in a series of attractive marine subjects; Miss A. M. Lockyer, whose drawings of cats and kittens are as diverting as ever—these and other practised hands have produced many very pretty designs, all of which are reproduced, and mounted in excellent style. The booklets are mostly dedicated to verse, the verse of Mr. Weatherley—who seems to be the Laureate of Christmas card publishers—and the verse of Mr. G. R. Sims, whose "In the Harbour" is illustrated by Mr. Walter Langley's clever drawings of fisherfolk and their life. A booklet, it seems, may be of almost any dimensions, varying from three inches by four or five to royal 8vo. Thus Mr. Tom Lloyd and Mr. Ernest Wilson provide a graceful pictorial setting to the pastoral verse of Thomas Lodge and other Elizabethans on a scale that is meet for exhibition or portfolio. Veritable booklets, and extremely pretty from all aspects, are "The Silvery Thames," by Ernest Wilson; "Flower Time," "Hay-time and Harvest," "Neath Summer Skies," and other miniature picture-books, all with poems and illustrations in monochrome. One of the prettiest of the booklets for children is Mr. Weatherley's "Happy Children," with illustrations in colour by Mr. St. Clair Simmons and Miss Alice West.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

BESIDES M. Ohnet, whose book we noticed last week, almost all the more prominent novelists of France have got ready each his or her volume for November and the Paris book season. Mme. Henry Gréville's L'avenir d'Aline (1) seems to us a good deal above the level of its author's recent work, though we are not quite sure whether the point which gives it interest to us was intended by the novelist. Aline is the daughter of a professeur, who dies in early middle age and leaves his wife and twelve-year-old child practically penniless. The mother (who is affectionate and sentimental, while the child is mistressful and rather hard) accepts after many misgivings an extremely lucrative place as governess in Russia, and not only amasses sufficient money in six years to keep the wolf from the door, but refuses an offer of marriage from her widowed employer. Meanwhile Aline has been sheltered by a lively widow, a friend of her mother's. Julianne Breton comes home to find the widow anxious to marry again, and Aline a very satirical young lady, less grateful to her hostess than desirous of cutting her out with an enticing young financier. The rest of the story need not be told; it ends well, though we are not sure that Aline's husband (no matter who he was) is to be congratulated. A stage catastrophe does not alter nature. Most of the characters are well drawn, and the good adopted-grandfather M. Leroy is agreeable. But the point to which we refer is contained in a scene between Aline and her mother, where the former demands all her mother's small savings (which she thinks larger than they are) as ma dot. It is not long ago that some one (we forget who it was) expressed his hopes that this dot system might be introduced into England. Mme. Gréville has exposed its essential ugliness very appositely. Some results of our own system are not pretty; but it can hardly lead to anything quite so loathsome as the situation of a young woman—supported, on the whole, by the customs and practice of her society—expecting her mother to impoverish herself in order to induce some man to be good enough, for money paid, to accept her, the young woman's, person.

If Mme. Gréville's work is above her average, M. Duruy's (2) is, to our taste at least, a long way below his. It is, in fact, nothing but an account of the last days and death of Gambetta (who is called Costalla) thrown into novel form, and provided with suitable explanations of what has been generally thought mysterious. How much of these explanations may rest upon actual fact which is not public property we do not know, and we do not care; but the selection of the subject at all seems to us not so much in doubtful taste as in taste inimitably and execrably bad. Nor should we say ourselves that the execution redeems the conception. M. Duruy can hardly write otherwise than forcibly and well; and the sketches of the patient mistress, Thérèse Gauthier, and the very impatient one, Aurélie Vidalin, with her son, Marius the Parricide, have power. But the pervading defect in taste, and therefore in art, mars the whole.

M. Duruy's chief rival among younger novelists has been somewhat, though not wholly, more fortunate in L'illusion de Florestan (3). The book is free from the griminess and hardness of some of M. Rabusson's work, but it is also rather thinner than most of that work. Florestan de la Garderie, a country-bred, but not particularly virtuous, young man, comes to Paris, convinced that the Earthly Paradise is to be found in a liaison with some accomplished Parisian lady. In short, he has the old, old lesson of Celle-ci et Celle-là to learn, and persists in learning it, despite the admonitions of not merely an Anglomaniac and sportmanlike uncle, but of a beautiful English or half-English widow, Mabel Baroness Gueyrard, who is the intimate friend of his chosen lady love, the Marquise de Fossanges. The rest who knows not? The Marquise is quite ready to betray her husband, to compromise herself with Florestan, to spurn the not wholly disinterested admonitions of Mabel. Florestan is as ready to imitate her in the last respect. But whereas he is, or thinks he is, ready to sail "à la rive fidèle où l'on aime toujours," he finds no such readiness in his mistress. She comes to the conclusion that great passion for a lover is as absurd and impossible as great passion for a husband. "Si nous étions capables d'aimer, est-ce que nous n'aimerions pas nos maris?" asks she of Mabel. Then why does she "succumb"? "C'est un peu affaire de perversité; mais surtout de distraction." Wherein it may be feared that M. Rabusson, who is after all a rather keen observer of modern society, speaks a good deal of truth—of truth which concerns France rather more than England, but both countries considerably. It is rather unfortunate that the personages whom he has set to work out this uncomfortable but not uninteresting thesis lack attraction. Florestan is a young fool, without the freshness which ought to attach to youthful folly, with a certain amount of depravity about him, and with (to Mabel) more than a certain amount of bad manners. Mme. de Fossanges is as heartless as Millamant pretended to be, without Millamant's charm; the uncle Le Hardouin is Major Pendennis without the Major's sap and humour; the husband is pitiable only; and Mabel herself, who would seem to be intended to give the foil to these, is allowed to be in questionable situations.

We perceive strongly in Mme. Bentzon's Tentée (4), and less strongly in the shorter story, "Faele," which serves as make-weight, the fault which has marred most of her work—the fault of writing from books instead of from life. Odette, the heroine of Tentée, is a Frenchwoman who has married an Englishman, and the whole of the English part is pure convention; indeed, we think we could put finger on the English book (if a work of the excellent Ouida's can be called English) which has chiefly inspired it. Lord Melton, and Odette's sisters-in-law, Isa, Maude, and Kate, are as much alive as if the first-named had been called Lord Boulingrog and the last Miss Ketty. And, though of course we speak with more hesitation on this head, the French characters themselves seem to us to have the same "out-of-book" character, the same absence of spontaneity and nature. Let it, however, be observed that Hugh Carlton, the English painter, plays a very respectable part in "Faele," if not an extremely lifelike one.

There is never any need of reserve or comparison or allowance in speaking of "Fortuné." A man is born or he is not born a client of M. du Boisgobey. If he is not, he has only not to attempt to read him, and may pass him by with a cordial and respectful salutation. If he is, he has only got to stick to his Fortuné and his Fortuné will put him through. We have not discerned in Marie Bas-de-laine (5) any features distinguishing it either for the better or for the worse from other "ops" of its prolific, beneficent, and admirably equal author. It is honest melodrama in novel form. "And what for no?"

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

THE future historian of the Secession war in the United States will have to sift and select from an enormous mass of material, if contributors do not speedily cease from their labours. Unceasing has been the flow during the last twenty years. From all quarters the instalments come, and chiefly from those who have taken active parts in the war or in the political movements that led to it. When makers of history become writers of history, it is obvious that the work of the true historian must be delayed. The hour and the man are not yet. In Mr. Eli Thayer's History of the Kansas Crusade (New York: Harper Brothers) we have the story of a remarkable political enterprise told at length by its originator. The book deals with the oft-told story of the desperate struggle waged over the question of slavery in Kansas, as the time approached when the claim of the Territory to be admitted as a free State or a slave State must be settled. Mr. Thayer's purpose is to show that the final settlement that resulted in the triumph of the "Free State cause" was brought about by the agency of the Emigrant Aid Company, promoted by himself and others of the "Free Soil" party in Massachusetts. By this bold move, at the very moment when the passing of the Kansas-Nebraska Bill repealed the "Missouri Compromise," there was established the nucleus of what became eventually a formidable colony of Anti-Slavery men in the midst of the enemy. It was a genuine colonial undertaking, duly legalized by the State of Massachusetts, equipped with means for building schools, churches, saw-mills, and other civilizing agents. The idea, it seems, had previously occurred to Dr. Edward Everett Hale, who, in his introduction to Mr. Thayer's narrative, declares that in 1845, during the early days of Texas, he had proposed a similar migration from the North to that territory, a kind of Mayflower expedition, an influx of New England "Free Soil" patriots that should purge Texas and save it. Mr. Thayer might, we think, have devoted a little more space to the history of these self-expatiated patriots and the progress of the colony, instead of filling so many pages with the testimonials of friendly politicians like Sumner, and the attacks of foes in the newspapers of the time. To many English readers it will be a little odd to note that Mr. Thayer reckons among his bitterest opponents the American Anti-Slavery Society and Abolitionists of the Garrison and Wendell Phillips school. Mischievous bigots and disunionists he styles them, and certainly they worked him and his cause as much ill in press and on platform as the fanatic John Brown, of whom he writes with refreshing candour, did in the Territory. He accepts Garrison's sneer that there was not one "Abolitionist" among his twenty thousand colonists, and thanks Heaven for it. It is not surprising that Southerners did not discriminate nicely between the Emigration Aid Company and Abolitionists. In the South all Anti-Slavery men were Abolitionists. Mr. Thayer is at some pains to show that there were men opposed to slavery on "principle," though the majority were moved by "sentiment." His record, with all its departures from strict narrative form, is full of interest. To create and foster public opinion in the North was of course the ordinary expedient of a politician; to import it manufactured into Kansas in the form of an organized colony was decidedly an original and notable achievement.

No more delightful book can be cited among the writings of its lamented author than The Brook and its Banks, by the Rev. J. G. Wood (Religious Tract Society). "One of the last books," as the editorial note observes, it is decidedly one of the best of this admirable observer and excellent writer. There is something akin to magic in the power that transports the reader in a few moments to the running water, free air and sunshine, and the not less pleasant influence of a sympathetic companion. The charm is the more remarkable because no writer could be less given to description as exemplified by the effusive school of writers. Mr. Wood seldom attempted to "describe" the habitats of insects or birds, yet by a few simple touches the haunts of water-fowl, or spider, or beetle, are painted with wonderful completeness and truth. The result, in the present volume, is a veritable excursion into "the fairy land of nature," illustrated by many beautiful woodcuts. We have a curious proof, by the way, of the fact that the popularity of Mr. Wood's works is not confined to those who pursue natural history as a study or recreation. Thirty years ago, the author remarks, he made the statement, printed in capital letters, "Insects never grow." The statement is repeated at p. 119 of The Brook and its Banks, because Mr. Wood continued to receive letters denying the fact. One person sent him several humble bees of various sizes. Another, who forwarded a number of cockroaches, wrote, "You do not understand what you are writing about, sir. Did you never see blackbeetles in your life? As you seem not to have seen them, I send you a lot which I caught myself in my kitchen, and they are all of different sizes. Insects do grow, and you are wrong." The last letter was probably from an angry cook. It concludes with a request for publication.

Mr. Frank Stockton's Personally Conducted (Sampson Low & Co.) is likely, we fear, to occasion some disappointment, for it is entirely devoid of Stocktonian humour, and is, in short, but a journal of travel in Europe, a decorous account of the ordinary progress of a voyaging American through Rome, Florence, Venice, the Rhine, the Netherlands, and England. Nor does Mr. Stockton contrive to say the thing that is new of "King London" or "Queen Paris," though for untravelled American boys and girls his experiences and impressions may prove interesting. The book, however, is well illustrated by Mr. Alfred Parsons, Mr. Joseph Pennell, and others.

There is a pretty gift of fancy, with some little poetic insight, in Mr. William Cartwright Newsam's Reveries, Rhymes, and Rondeaux (Griffith, Farran, & Co.) Grace, as well as facility, may be said to distinguish the rondeaus. Smooth execution is the one thing to be noted of the sonnets and remaining pieces.

We must confess to have courageously put to the test An Outline Analysis of "Sordello," by Jeanie Morison (Blackwood & Sons), without any considerable enlightenment of our original sin of incomprehension. With so earnest and sympathetic an exponent the result is extremely mortifying. There is more of commentary, however, than of analysis in this little book. Others may be more fortunate, and for them the darkness may be lifted. In the meanwhile

We sit possessed in patience; prison doors
Will burst one day, and Heaven beam overhead.

There is a good deal of instruction for teachers in two geographical class-books before us. Mr. Redway's Teacher's Manual of Geography (Boston: Heath & Co.) is intended to supplant the ordinary work of the teacher. Topics in Geography, by W. F. Nicholls, A.M. (Boston: Heath & Co.), also contains its "hints to teachers," but, unlike the companion work, the system of teaching is presented in "grades," which are exceedingly inclusive of the subject. Mr. Redway appears to be an advocate of pedantic innovations in certain matters. He insists upon the spelling "Bering" for Behring, the navigator, and declares that "Europe and Asia form a single body of land, to which the name Eurasia, or Europe-Asia, is now commonly given." He proceeds to inform a misguided world that "Africa is a peninsula attached to Eurasia, and not an island." Why not call the three continents Eurasia?

High School Lectures, by M. E. G. Hewett, A.Q.C. (Swan Sonnenschein & Co.), comprises brief addresses to the Girls' High School at Napier, New Zealand, on Health, Food, Dress, Books, and so forth, appropriate to the occasion, no doubt, though it were hard to suggest a reason for publication.

The Public Schools Year Book, 1889 (Swan Sonnenschein & Co.), comprises an "educational" and an "athletic" section, and much useful information in both, to judge from the diverse points of view of boys, and parents or guardians. Particulars of thirty schools are given. The editors, by the way, might do well to curtail the "athletic" record, and economize space. It is absurd to give the same cricket score in full twice, as at pp. 5-7.

We have received the first instalment of The Works of Josephus, translated by Whiston, revised by the Rev. A. R. Shilleto, M.A., with topographical notes by Sir C. M. Wilson, K.C.M.G. (Bell & Sons). This addition to "Bohn's Standard Library" is to be completed in five volumes.

We have also received John Bright, by the Rev. Charles Bullock, a "non-political sketch of a good man's life" (Home Words Office); Memoirs of Henry Richard, by Lewis Appleton, F.R.H.S. (Trübner & Co.), and Duncan's Brewery Manual for 1889 (Effingham Wilson), from which it appears that, while brewery Companies are everywhere being formed, less beer was consumed last year "per head of the population" than in any year since 1865, with the exception of 1885.

We regret extremely that, by an oversight, in the review of Mr. Palgrave's "Treasury of Sacred Song" Addison's "The spacious firmament on high," which is actually included, was spoken of as omitted. Mr. Palgrave also informs us that the death of Dr. Bonar occurred after the book passed through the press.

SUN LIFE OFFICE.

EXTRACTS FROM THE SOCIETY'S PROSPECTUS.

Dealing with all the most IMPORTANT POINTS necessary to be considered by Life Insurers.

- (1.) The AGE. This Society was ESTABLISHED in the year 1810.
- (2.) The FUNDS of the Society are AMPLE and WELL INVESTED.
- (3.) The ULTIMATE COST of Assurance in the "SUN."

The Bonus declared in January 1888 proves that a WITH PROFIT Policy, under Table A, opened with the Sun Life Office can be had at considerably LESS THAN COST PRICE—that is, can be eventually obtained for less than the UNLOADED NET PREMIUM.

- (4.) The LIBERALITY of the "SUN'S" CONTRACT and PRACTICAL FACILITIES for DEALING with its Policies.
- (5.) ECONOMY of Management in the "SUN."

EXTRAVAGANT and INJUDICIOUS Expenditure can NEVER produce LARGE BONUS Results to Policy-Holders; hence it is of the FIRST IMPORTANCE that ECONOMICS should be understood and practised.

The Expense Ratio on RENEWAL Premiums, after making due allowance for the large amount of new business transacted, was exceedingly moderate.

- (6.) The BASIS of Valuation in the "SUN."

The Valuation, June 24, 1887, was made by the CARLISLE Table of Mortality, on the Basis of which the Premiums charged have long been calculated; a low rate of Interest has been assumed, viz., 3 PER CENT., and the NET PREMIUMS have only been dealt with, thus leaving FUTURE PROFITS entirely UNANTICIPATED.

- (7.) The TEST of Stability.

The Sun Life Assurance Society on the 24th June, 1887, had—(a) Over TWELVE Years' Premium Income in Hand exclusive of Share Capital; (b) Over £36 Cash invested against every £100 assured.

- (8.) The DISTRIBUTION of PROFITS in the "SUN."

Bonuses have been regularly declared since 1843, amounting in the aggregate to £1,857,452, and at the last Division, which was exceptionally large, £192,706 was apportioned, and resulted in an average

CASH RETURN OF £36 IN EVERY £100 PAID IN PREMIUMS.

(For Qualification, see PROSPECTUS.)

THE THREE DISTINCTIVE FEATURES of the Society, to which intending Assurers should SPECIALLY DIRECT THEIR ATTENTION, are:—

- 1.—No AGENTS have ever been employed or Commission paid for the introduction of Assurances.

It is estimated that by the non-allowance of Commission the last Bonus in 1886 was increased by no less a sum than £40,000.

- 2.—The Expenses of Management are on a remarkably low scale.

- 3.—The business is chiefly with the CLERGY, among whom the RATE OF MORTALITY IS MUCH LOWER than among the general population.

In consequence of these special characteristics VERY LARGE PROFITS have arisen for distribution as BONUS among the Members.

Policies in force FIVE YEARS are exempt from any extra Premium for foreign residence.

THE PARIAH. By F. ANSTEY, Author of "Vice Versa," "The Giant's Robe," "A Fallen Idol," &c.

There is not a dull page—we might say, not a dull sentence in it.....The girls are delightfully drawn, especially the bewitching Margot and the childish Lettice. Noting that polish and finish, cleverness, humour, wit and sarcasm can give is left out."

"Before another Russo-Afghan scare frightens John Bull out of his wits, Mr.

W. F. Ainsworth has bethought himself of pointing to a means by which British commerce and influence can spread all over Persia and checkmate the Bear..... Probably if the Karun became a haunt of British shipping, a stream of Asiatic commerce would be diverted southwards that would eclipse the dreams of avarice, besides supplying a big market for our own goods."—The Rialto.

"If we cannot 'put a girdle round the earth' in our own proper persons, perhaps the best substitute is to go on the trip vicariously with the help of a genial tourist like Mr. Frederickson..... The plates are excellent, drawn with spirit and fidelity, and printed with considerable success..... Mr. Frederickson appears to be an accomplished botanist, and many of his coloured sketches and descriptions of curious Eastern flowers and fruits are highly interesting."—St. James's Gazette.

A HISTORY of the LATER ROMAN

EMPIRE from ARCADIVS to IRENE, A.D. 395–800. By JOHN B. BURY, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Trinity College, Dublin. 2 vols. 8vo. 32s.

The idea of this work is to exhibit the function that the Roman Empire, after its disintegration in the fifth century, continued to perform in the development of Europe, down to the coronation of Charles the Great; thus it covers the four centuries in which the change from the ancient to the mediæval order of things was taking place. Since Gibbon no English writer has dealt with this period in its entirety, and Gibbon's account of the Empire itself becomes, as is well known, brief and inadequate after the death of Heraclius.

THE PORTUGUESE PRETENSIONS.

THE worst enemies of the present Government must acknowledge privately, and some of them have acknowledged publicly, that the reception given by the FOREIGN SECRETARY to the recent claims of Portugal in South Central Africa is exactly what ought to have been given. There has seldom been so rickety a pretension as this on which the new paper province of Zumbo is enthroned. Although all international law is contentious enough, there is, perhaps, less contention about no point than about the proceedings necessary to give validity to the claim of territorial possession. It must be a claim prior to that of other nations, it must be distinctly made, and it must be followed up by, at least, some attempt to make the possession real. In none of these respects can any sufficient evidence be produced in support of the Portuguese position. Portugal's original claim, if it is pushed far enough back, and tied down close enough to specification, must probably come to the famous Papal division or something like it; and it need hardly be said that England is not bound to recognize that. It is not clear that much of the actual interior was ever even thoroughly explored by the Portuguese, or included in the most nominal manner in any administrative divisions. And it is clear that for years, and almost for centuries, they have contented themselves with not too actively organizing the two districts on the Lower Guinea and Mozambique coasts respectively. Their recent activity, such as it is, is exactly of that kind which induces a man to put in a claim to anything which he has hitherto thought worthless, and his neighbour has made, or seems likely to make, profitable. Lord SALISBURY has properly enough pointed out that in at least three cases—the encroachment on Mashonaland, which we hold by agreement with LOBENGULA, that on the course of the Loangwa, where we also have treaties with the tribes, and that in the Nyassa and Shire district, where British subjects are actually settled—these new pretensions not only set up what does not exist, but interfere with what does exist. And since the publication of the despatch to Mr. PETRE, Mr. SELOUS, than whom there is no higher authority, has arrived from the very districts concerned, and reports that not a few of the natives not only acknowledge no allegiance to the Portuguese, but have never even heard of Portugal.

It is manifest, however, that these words may have to be backed up with deeds. The much-talked-of agreements of Portugal with France and Germany will offer no difficulty, for neither France nor Germany has even the faintest interest in the country concerned. But there will be two real difficulties—one, the awkwardness of getting at the country, and the other, the tendency of all small States to presume upon their own weakness and dare the correction of their betters. The reported good intentions and desires of the Portuguese as to the slave-trade, and so forth, will neither make nor mar; for, though Portugal has about the worst record of any European nation in this respect, the cant is a cant common to all, and no nation has much right to reproach another with it. Those interested in the existing settlements about Lake Nyassa and those interested in the new province of the British South African Company must consider their position at once boldly and carefully, and act so that they may be supported without difficulty by the Home Government in case of need. Only let us add that, if that Government gives heed to evil advisers and abandons Swaziland, more harm will have been done than any bold front towards Portuguese claims, which are unlikely to be very vigorously carried out, can make up for. In fact, the future of British South Africa, already unfavourably affected to some extent by the strange folly about Angra Pequena, will be far more grievously threatened on the other side, and in far more ways, by this new rifiuto, which the Government cannot put upon their predecessors. The first duty of every English Government now is to preserve, and, if possible to recover, every access from the coast to the interior, the second is to resist paper claims to the interior itself. We shall be loth to believe that the fatal policy of throwing away with one hand while grasping with the other is to be pursued; but, if it is, we shall not hesitate to denounce it in the most unsparing terms.

LORD MELBOURNE.

LORD MELBOURNE'S PAPERS, which Messrs. LONGMAN have published under the skilful editorship of Mr. LLOYD SANDERS, have been selected from manuscripts in the possession of Lord COWPER, who introduces them by an interesting and graceful preface, conveying his personal impressions and recollections of his distinguished kinsman. Mr. SANDERS's notes show ample knowledge of politics and society during the period over which the papers extend, and they are judiciously restricted to points necessary for the illustration of the text. Lord MELBOURNE was not a great man; he was not a great statesman; he was not a great party leader; he was not a great debater; he was not a great, though he was a fairly competent, administrator; he was not even, as Mr. ABRAHAM HAYWARD testified, from a minute and varied observation of the order, from his station below the salt, a grand seigneur; but he was a great character, and might have sat for his portrait to THEOPHRASTUS or LA BRUYÈRE, or their nineteenth-century successor, THEOPHRASTUS SUCH. He was at once singularly winning and singularly puzzling, uniting the opposite charms of frankness and reserve, open-hearted and solitary-minded. He was not in any sense born to the purple. Early in the eighteenth century SWIFT remarked that the conduct of political affairs in England had fallen out of the hands of the great nobles into those of new men. Interpreted by the feelings and usages of our time, in which a lord is a lord, and one lord is as good as another, and every squire, not necessarily large-acred, is potentially a peer, the remark seems scarcely intelligible. The composition of the Governments of WILLIAM and ANNE, and of the first two GEORGES, has a very aristocratic aspect, if we consider merely names and titles. But in SWIFT's time, and long after, there were social discriminations which have since been effaced. The distance which separated the great noble of almost princely rank and wealth from a peer of less degree, the peer from the country gentleman, and country gentlemen, according to the size of their estates and the antiquity of their families, from each other, was almost as great as that which now divides the squire from the tradesman. It was expressed much in the same way, by a haughty reserve or a condescending familiarity on the one side and a meek deference on the other. Among the Prime Ministers of England, from WALPOLE to GREY, NEWCASTLE, DEVONSHIRE, GRAFTON, and PORTLAND may, in virtue of their ducal rank and great possessions, be counted among the great nobles, in spite of spurious or foreign origin, merely matrimonial elevation, and "new blood" enriched by Church spoils; but these are all, unless we are to reckon in ROCKINGHAM and SHELBURNE. Lord MELBOURNE belonged to the newest of the new nobility. An attorney well in the background of the TUDOR or STUART period is a very respectable ancestor; but a Georgian attorney, whose deprecations are witnessed to by a neighbouring family's limitation to a right of fishing over lands which were once their own, is with difficulty shaded off or softened down. Lord

MELBOURNE, save for the general reserve implied in his remark, "Who the devil can tell who is anybody's father?" had no illusion on the subject of his ancestry, and roughly brushed aside the inference perceptible in Sir EDWIN LANDSEER's frank amazement at the accidental resemblance between MELBOURNE's features and those depicted in a portrait—not a family portrait—which hung on the wall, and which had given occasion to some entirely groundless scandal. The general opinion, unfounded, Mr. GALTON tells us, that men of remarkable ability usually derive their talents from their mothers, receives such confirmation as an individual instance can give it from the fact that the first Lady MELBOURNE was not only, in her son's judgment, but in that of Lord BYRON, and most of his contemporaries, a woman of rare and almost unique gifts and accomplishments.

WILLIAM LAMB, who was born in 1779, was a younger son, and, in accordance with a common custom, observed in the cases of Lord HENRY PETTY, Lord PALMERSTON, and Lord JOHN RUSSELL, received his early University education in Scotland—not, however, at Edinburgh, under DUGALD STEWART, but at Glasgow, under Professor MILLAR. He afterwards went to Cambridge, and, having taken his degree, was called to the Bar. He practised long enough to win one brief. His elder brother's death made it unnecessary for him to pursue his profession, and he betook himself to politics. He entered the House of Commons in 1805, and took his place among the supporters of Mr. FOX. This was a few months before the accession of that statesman to power, under the nominal premiership of Lord GRENVILLE. A raw recruit had naturally no place in the new Administration. Mr. LAMB's party connexion is now chiefly remembered by his literary skirmish with CANNING; political antagonists then exchanging verses as they exchanged shots, the one method of giving satisfaction being without prejudice to the other. The dismissal of the GRENVILLE Administration condemned Mr. LAMB, if the word can properly be applied to a release which he relished, to twenty years of Opposition. He first took office as Irish Secretary in 1827, under his old antagonist of the Anti-Jacobin, an office which he retained under Lord GODERICH, and, until the secession of the Canningites, under the Duke of WELLINGTON. In 1830 he became Home Secretary in the Administration of Lord GREY, having in the meantime succeeded to the peerage. The intrigue which led to GREY's retirement in 1834 raised MELBOURNE to the premiership, which he held until his dismissal by WILLIAM IV. in the same year, returning to it in 1835, and continuing to hold it until the defeat of his Government on the Corn-law question in 1841. His political career was now over, though he was hard to persuade of the fact, and was anxious to return to office. His natural life lasted seven years longer.

LAMB's career in the House of Commons cannot be said to have been distinguished. He was not an orator, and, perhaps, for that reason undervalued oratory, saying that the worst thing he had heard of the Spanish Cortes was that its members were good speakers. BROUGHAM ranked him with WARD among the finikin prize-essay spouters who are absolutely useless in debate. WARD retained this manner to the last, but LAMB threw it aside, and preferred to be without any manner at all. He was capable, when he was warmed by attack, of strong energetic retorts, which went straight to their mark; but then, the reflection probably occurring to him, What is the good of it all? he hum'd and ha'd through a string of broken sentences until it was time to sit down. As the statist—the word was not then supposed to mean statisticians—of HAMLET's time thought it a baseness to write fair, so the Whig statesmen who followed FOX, with one or two notable exceptions, appear to have thought it a baseness to speak well. They copied their leader's hesitations and repetitions, as the followers of PITT reproduced his unbroken and monotonous fluency. MELBOURNE, as he himself confessed, had not the House of Commons temperament. It confused him. He could lay his mind side by side with another individual mind; he was at ease when he could give free play to his love of paradox and draw on his large stores of out-of-the-way knowledge; but he was wholly unable to address himself to the average stupidity, the residual dulness of either House. Moreover, he could not swear or call people fools in Parliament, and these resources seem to have been absolutely necessary to the unimpeded exercise of his faculties. As an administrator he appears to have done his work well, in difficult times, both at the Irish Office and at the Home Office. The idea that he wanted firmness seems a mistake. The letters in which "Viscount MELBOURNE presents his humble duty to Your MAJESTY" are among the most peremptory that a Minister ever addressed to a Sovereign, and are usually lectures to WILLIAM IV. on his duty and lessons in Royal humility. The candour, too, with which he spoke his mind to Lord BROUGHAM about Lord BROUGHAM is remarkable. He was apparently the only one of his colleagues who was not afraid of Lord DURHAM. An encounter with BROUGHAM he likened to standing up against CRIBB or GULLY, which might cause him some trepidation; but he would be quite, he said, at his ease at the prospect of a set-to with LUTTRELL or old ROGERS.

Lord COWPER restores to MELBOURNE, with every evidence of internal probability, a remark attributed to SYDNEY SMITH, to whom, on the principle that to him who hath shall be given, many good things have been assigned in which he had no right of ownership. A jest's prosperity lies as much in the reputation of the jester as in the ear of him that hears it. It was MELBOURNE, and not SYDNEY SMITH, who wished that he was as sure of anything as TOM MACAULAY was of everything. The Canon of St. Paul's was at once too sound and too cautious a divine to avow himself a universal sceptic. MELBOURNE's favourite sayings, "Can't you leave it alone?" and "It's all one to me," were something more than the expression of indolent indifference. He had a profound sense of the futility of things human, of the disposition of events to take a path of their own, and not to walk in that which has been marked out for them; of the treachery of the future, to which, therefore, it was desirable to commit nothing that could be withheld from it. It was this sentiment which made him despise system-makers. Nature and human nature were too large and varied and evasive to be fitted into any framework of theory. He told ROBERT OWEN to his face, though he had a kindness for the man, that he was one of the most foolish persons he had ever conversed with, which was probably true enough. The Benthamites were all fools. "AUSTIN? a damned fool. Did you ever read his Juris-prudence?" Fond as he was of letters and speculation, he hated men of letters and men of science. He conveyed the offer of a pension to FARADAY in terms so offensive that the philosopher indignantly rejected it, and was only appeased by a letter of apology. On this, or on some other, occasion he affected to think that FARADAY was an astronomer. Yet his best talk was about books, and scarcely any topic in connexion with them, from the credibility of QUINTUS CURTIUS to JANE AUSTEN's novels, from the controversy of ST. JEROME and VIGILANTIUS to the etymologies of HORNE TOOKE's Diversions of Purley, lay beyond the scope of his knowledge and interest. He was an insatiable reader of theology, and went through LARDNER's Credibility, comparing it point by point with the New Testament, with the result, as JOHN ALLEN put it, that he got rid of all his doubts, and settled down into a fixed conviction of unbelief. Possibly MELBOURNE's love of paradox, and his pleasure in startling the feelings of those with whom he talked, had something to do with this impression, congenial as it was to ALLEN's mind. His healthy animal nature, which was indicated in a countenance and frame of rustic beauty and vigour, gave him so keen a relish for life in all its aspects that, as the late Lord DERBY put it, he enjoyed even a Lord Mayor's dinner. A half-insane wife, whom he could live neither with nor without, and an idiot son put domestic happiness out of the question; but, in contradiction to the opinion of most of those who knew him, it may be doubted whether MELBOURNE by nature was a conjugally-minded person. He needed and lived largely in mental solitude; into the last recesses of his nature no one but himself could enter. The great objection to marriage, he early wrote, is that two minds can never act like one. To him, even in the happiest circumstances, constant association would have brought with it a sense of friction and intrusion. He liked the society of women, but not their habitual companionship. It required strong health, he said, to put up with a woman. The real work of his life was done during the last four years of his premiership, from the beginning of the present reign to his own retirement from office. The clear intelligence and upright purpose of the QUEEN would, in any circumstances, have worked their way through difficulties and embarrassments of youthful and feminine sovereignty. But, as a matter of fact, it was Lord MELBOURNE's hand that smoothed the path for her, and some share in the blessings which have marked the happiest reign in our history may be claimed for the benignant affection and sagacious counsel which guided its opening years.

THE NAPOLEON OF SPECIAL CORRESPONDENTS.

IT would be absurd to deny—almost as absurd as to exaggerate after the fashion of the daily newspapers—the interest of the communications which have been recently received from Mr. HENRY STANLEY. We deal elsewhere with such additions as they have made to our knowledge of African geography and ethnology; we deal here with the more ephemeral but not less interesting subject of Mr. STANLEY's ethos as explorer and reliever revealed by these letters. We think that, on the whole, they should greatly increase his reputation as a man of affairs; and if, as is rumoured, he is disposed to accept the post of Childe ROLAND and come to the Dark Tower of African command, we shall ourselves be glad enough to welcome his appointment. He will do his day's darg like few people, and we believe him to be as trustworthy as Major DUGALD DALGETTY himself to his actual employers. What he has recently done is no inconsiderable feat. To relieve and support EMIN Pasha he took, as we verily believe, the worst way possible. To begin with, he lost time by his selection of route; in the second place, he gave an enormous impulsion to the "wave of insanity" which is now sweeping over Central Africa by employing TIPPOO TIB on something like TIPPOO TIB's own terms; in the third place, his arrangement of his rearguard was such as to throw the chief difficulty on his unfortunate subordinate, of whom he has not spoken too generously; in the fourth, his journeys backwards and forwards distinctly interfered, and could not but interfere, with his power of actually succouring EMIN. But all this was Napoleonic—quite Napoleonic. Most Napoleonic of all, perhaps, is the almost unconscious contempt which he shows for "ideologues" like EMIN, CASATI, and the rest, "or GORDON"—as Mr. STANLEY very characteristically remarks. "Why should these idiots [we give his sense, not his words] hesitate? Why should they mind leaving their people? Here are sensible Khedives and Sir EVELYN BARINGS who say they must stay, if they stay at all, on their own responsibility. Here am I (a little delayed by my Congo route; but no matter) ready to give them ammunition and put them through. What are the fools about?" We apologize for this uncereceremonious vulgarization of Mr. STANLEY's words, but we think that most people who have read his letters "with their heads," as Mr. CARLYLE used to say, will admit that they are not ill interpreted. That EMIN and persons like EMIN, including that much greater than he, GORDON, see duty before them of a higher kind than mere obedience to orders, that they actually acquire an affection for the people—foolish, fickle, treacherous even though they be—to whom they have acted as shepherds so long, are subjects of impatient wonder to Mr. STANLEY. "The fatal fascination of Soudan territory," says he. Well, most fascinations are fatal. Your practical man or woman is never fascinated, and finds himself or herself all the better. If you happen to be an "ideologue," to be a GORDON, or an EMIN; to be, in a different sphere, a FRANCIS XAVIER, or a ST. STEPHEN; to be, in a different sphere still, a STRAFFORD or an ANTONY, it will probably go hard with you while it goes well enough with others. Still there are some who, like the excellent Miss CRAWLEY, have a certain kindness for any one who will go to the Devil—and not always to the Devil only—for a fascination.

Putting aside this little peculiarity, and some others, Mr. STANLEY has on the whole a good story to tell. He appears after the still not entirely explained, but, we fear, explicable, collapse of the rearguard to have been admirably served by his subordinates. He himself, a person not lavish of praise, has told us enough already of the proceedings of Mr. JEPHSON and Mr. BONNY, of Captain NELSON and Lieutenant STAIR and Dr. PARKE, to fill us with admiration. It is extremely hazardous to criticize at such a distance, and with such comparatively slight information, documents of this nature. But we should suggest that Mr. JEPHSON's surprise at the attitude of the Pasha's troops expresses rather the natural annoyance of a man who finds himself a prisoner when he had hoped to be a saviour than the deliberate judgment of a well-informed judge. Nothing is easier than for a new-comer to fathom such a state of things correctly enough as to its actual condition, but to be quite wrong in estimating the responsibility of its authors. That EMIN Pasha is not the equal of GORDON we can readily admit. He is a German, and not an Englishman; a man of science, not a man of action, and in a way of literature; a doctor, not a soldier. But it would be wholly unfair to forget that for years before Mr. STANLEY's coming he had successfully repelled the Mahdist invasions, and recovered ground from those which were partially successful; that he had kept the province in order and preserved the affection of his troops. Very likely the "wave of insanity" had reached them by the time Mr. STANLEY arrived, and it is all the more to be regretted that Mr. STANLEY's material strength and his downright, unsentimental, practical leadership were not at once thrown in with full force to put backbone into the Pasha, and stem at once invasion and disaffection. The latter is almost inevitable in such cases, whether the troops are named Argyraspides or Black Battalions, whether the leader is named EUMENES or EMIN. The object of fidelity is far off and gives little sign; the tempters to treason are near and active. In the present case we know that Mr. STANLEY's arrival was used directly as a means of working on the fickle native troops. We do not think that Mr. STANLEY could have helped this; but we do think that he might have foreseen it, and have made different arrangements so as to throw his whole force on EMIN's side as soon as the unfavourable effect was produced. It is easy, of course, to make this armchair criticism, and it is as easy to dismiss it as such. But it is animated by no ill-will to Mr. STANLEY, it is based on pretty considerable acquaintance with the history of such things, and it is consistent with a very hearty desire that he, or somebody else in his spirit, though perhaps with a little less of that contempt of ideology which brought NAPOLEON to his fall, should take Central African affairs in hand and check the "wave of insanity." If this is done, and is not done by an Englishman, or some one representing England, then foreigners will have a right to call our nation a puissance finie.

It is not from Mr. STANLEY, but from the opposite direction, that we hear, as we should have expected to hear, the natural results of the evacuation of the Equatorial province, on which fresh light is being thrown by new instalments of letters to and from EMIN. It is reported from Khartoum that the attacks of the Dervishes are to be directed once more in earnest on the Egyptian frontier, in the hope of repairing the disaster of Toski. It appears to be held in the councils of the KHALIFA that the flight of EMIN necessitates no more efforts in that direction, that Abyssinia can be sufficiently taken care of by mere raiding, and that the chief efforts of the faithful should be directed against Wady Halfa. We know, of course, that the faithful, whether they find Paradise or not, will not find victory. They will be repulsed as they have been repulsed before—perhaps with more difficulty, perhaps with less; perhaps with less slaughter, perhaps with more. But if they make an advance, that advance will illustrate once more the extraordinary folly of the arrangement which Mr. GLADSTONE's Government made, and which Lord SALISBURY's Government has continued. No rich, peaceable, civilized country since the earliest times recorded in history has ever safely contented itself with merely repulsing raids from poor, warlike, uncivilized tribes on its borders, who are left undisturbed in their own haunts. It is not in nature that such a course of proceedings ever should be successful. And we have now by laches, if not by overt act, made the possibility of its success less than ever. Not content with instituting no pursuit after the defeated raiders at Wady Halfa and Souakim, we have suffered the last remnant of civilization in the south to go by default of timely assistance. The presence of EMIN in the Equatorial province may not have exerted any very great deterrent effect on the rebels at Khartoum, but it exerted some. Now they have nothing to fear or to conquer there, while their lucky hit in Abyssinia has for a time made them secure on that side, intestine dissension and the local dislike of Italian interference being sure to hamper the NEGUS. Therefore, they think they can devote their whole attention to Egypt. A small well-equipped expedition under Mr. STANLEY, or another, directed at the Albert Nyanza might alter their calculations.

ADDITIONS TO THE NAVY.

THE launch in the course of this week of the Pelorus and the Blake is at least a proof that the work of strengthening the navy is being pushed on. The first of these vessels is to belong to the squadron which the Australian colonies have agreed to support—as part of a general scheme of Imperial defence. She is, therefore, if nothing else, a sign that the Conference of the Jubilee year has not been barren of practical results. On patriotic grounds there is every reason to hope that she may be as good as the scheme she is designed to put into practice. Unfortunately the description of the vessel does not inspire confidence. It is a great deal too like the description of some of our other cruisers which have lamentably belied the promises of their designers. The Pelorus is “265 feet between perpendiculars, her extreme breadth is 41 feet, her mean draught is 15 feet 6 inches, and her displacement 2,575 tons. She will be fitted with twin screw triple expansion machinery of the aggregate power, with forced draught of about 7,000 horses (indicated), and with natural draught of about 4,500 indicated horse-power.” She is to attain a speed of nineteen knots with forced draught and seventeen with natural draught. All this—well as it sounds—is, to put it frankly, a great deal too like the description of H.M.S. Magicienne and the other failures of the M Class. It shows that the Pelorus is a light vessel carrying a very powerful engine; and, with the M Class before us as a warning, it would be rash indeed to take it for granted that the Pelorus will stand the strain to which she is to be subjected any better than they have done. It remains to be seen on real trial whether it will not be found that the engines, which are meant to force her to a high nominal rate of speed, do, in fact, tear her to pieces. Other vessels answering to much the same description, both in our navy and in others, have as yet only proved how impossible it is to exert more power in any machine than the machine will bear.

The Blake is an infinitely more promising war-ship. In her case the Admiralty has recognized the fact that, in order to attain great speed at sea, and to keep it up, it is necessary to have size. The Blake will be a vessel of 9,000 tons, and is, therefore, larger than any vessel yet built as a cruiser and not a battle-ship. She is not the less promising because she is in some respects a return to old models. Neither is it a less promising fact that she marks the beginning of a reaction against the mania for small vessels carrying very heavy engines. A few years ago it was almost a commonplace to declare that the time of great ships was over; that, in these days of arms of precision, torpedoes, and so forth, the ship of the future was to be small and very swift. Flotillas of such craft, it was asserted, would swarm round the clumsy big ships, and soon destroy them. The late M. GABRIEL CHARMES was the chief spokesman of this school, which, luckily for us, did succeed in applying its principles for a time in the French Admiralty. A little experience has shown that small and very swift are almost contradictory terms as applied to ships. The torpedo-boats have illustrated the truth most effectually, which, as they were to have been the destroyers of the big ships, is an example of poetic justice. Their twenty-knot speed, from which nothing was to escape, has been found to be available only on measured miles, and in absolutely calm weather. When the wind begins to blow, even in moderation, their speed drops to half, or less than half, that imposing figure. A ten-knot boat could keep them at a distance and a twelve-knot boat walk away from them. A very similar discovery has been made with the smaller cruisers; none of them have kept the promise of speed made on their behalf by their designers. They may attain a high rate of speed, but they cannot keep it up. It is not very creditable to the Admiralty that so many experiments and so many costly failures should have been required to convey a lesson which could have been learnt from a comparison between the Atlantic liners and other merchant ships. It is, however, but idle to complain of the tardiness, and we must be content to see that a truth has been recognized at last. The Blake may be spoilt by over-gunning and by too many machines; but at least she has size enough to bear both heavy armament and powerful engines, and to bear them with ease in a seaway. Even as it is, she will not attain the speed of the Atlantic liners. That is a fact worth noting, not as a reproach to her builders, but as a proof that in these days of steam a vessel built for speed only can always excel a vessel which is also built to fight. From that we may fairly draw the deduction that, since something must be sacrificed in the war-ship, it is better to give up her power of overtaking a packet rather than her power to beat an enemy. If, as Lord GEORGE HAMILTON has just been saying in his very cheerful speech at Liverpool, we are to rely on hired merchant ships to do our scouting in war, it is the less necessary to strain for very great speed in cruisers. The rest of the FIRST LORD'S speech is of the brisk, confident, official stamp, and not, therefore (to be frank), more instructive than the unmeasured growl of the regular critic. We should have preferred something to show that the Admiralty is going to give up experimenting in miraculous fittings, “phenomenal” ships, and overgrown guns.

LORD SALISBURY AT NOTTINGHAM.

THE infallible test of reception by adversaries applies in a very satisfactory manner to the PRIME MINISTER'S speech, or speeches, before the Conservative Conference at Nottingham. When your enemies can only exclaim “Stuff and nonsense!” the reverse of the celebrated dictum of the Greek orator is allowable, and a man may well ask, “Have I then said something wise?” In the particular reference Lord SALISBURY had said something wise, though he had said nothing new. He had said that the demands of the Irish Home Rule party amount to something on which the life of the nation and the existence of the Empire depend. In saying this he had said not only what the enormous majority of men of sense and brains, of knowledge and reasoning faculty, in England say at this moment—not only what almost the entire body of such men in both political parties said but the other day, but what the only man in the present English Home Rule party who has argued the question, Mr. JOHN MORLEY, admitted, in his celebrated argument that we must risk even this danger, lest the Irish make themselves intolerable—just what, by the way, a certain section of Whigs said about the resistance to NAPOLEON, urging that we must not resist him because he was irresistible. And it will always remain a standing proof of the positive insanity which party spirit may bring with it that men of ability and education should meet the anti-Home Rule arguments by saying that there are a great many independent Parliaments in the British Empire already. So might it be said, “O foolish man! there are fires in Peking, and you do not mind it; Constantinople has constant conflagrations, and you sit at ease; the engines are at work almost daily in Paris, and you pay no attention; and yet you are in a flutter of alarm because the semi-detached house next door is in a blaze!”

But what Lord SALISBURY had to say on this well-worn subject was not what was expected with most interest. We are not wholly with those who think that Ministers spend too much time upon Ireland. The person who complains of such repetition because it bores him is neither a good citizen, nor a wise politician, nor invariably a very sincere speaker; his affectation of boredom being as often as not affectation merely. But undoubtedly there are other parts of the world besides the best puffed and most spoilt island in that world, and other subjects besides its condition and government. The mere party position of the Government is a very interesting subject, and the details of its past and intended policy, both domestic and foreign, are very interesting too. In reference to the first, Lord SALISBURY was not, we think, unduly sanguine, and was quite sound. Especially was he sound in putting forward the necessity of organization. The old “Register! Register!” has not lost its force, but has become merged in the greater necessity of managing your register when you have got it. With every increase of the franchise the party of the doubtfuls, of the men who, whether they have been put on the register as Tories or put on it as Radicals, are at each election to be won to the side which applies most skilful and most unremitting pressure to them, increases. With every split of parties, every change of questions, it increases likewise. Good influences and bad work in the same way; and it is hardly too much to say that the business of each election has to be done very much as if the whole register were neutral, and had to be made Tory or made Gladstonian de novo. It is mainly because Gladstonians have, on the whole, and with some brilliant exceptions, understood this better than the other side that the Gladstonian triumphs in bye-elections have been obtained. In regard to those elections, nothing can be more true than that, not merely no bye-election, but not even a disaster at a general election, can settle such a question as Home Rule. The analogy of Reform Bills and suchlike things is quite delusive. An extension of the franchise may be wise or unwise, prejudicial or beneficial. But in hardly any case can it lead directly and immediately to absolutely unworkable and intolerable results. It is the contention of those who resist Home Rule that it is unworkable and intolerable; that civil war might as well be accepted at once; that it must, in fact, end in civil war or in the paralysis of government.

On Lord SALISBURY's attitude to the Eight Hours Bill nothing need be said, because at present the question is one on which Mr. GLADSTONE has not yet seen a possibility of getting votes, and therefore all Gladstonians of sense are at one with all Unionists of sense on the subject. Nor is there likely to be much difference felt, however much may be expressed, on the subject of allotments and assisted education. We do not think compulsory allotments a good thing, because we know, as all honest politicians who have looked into the matter know, that the cases where men cannot get small allotments without compulsion are very rare, and that large allotments are of less than dubious value. We do not like assisted education, simply because we do not like the compulsory education of which it is the corollary, or the extension of State aid of any kind in a greater measure than is necessary to help men to help themselves. But assisted education is, in fact, the corollary of compulsory education, and if you have an Allotments Act, you must get it to work or repeal it. And Lord SALISBURY's "concessions" on these points were more than compensated by his unflinching attitude in reference to those strongholds of religious freedom, the denominational schools, which our Gladstonian friends would disestablish in favour of as near an approach to enforced atheism as they dare.

Of such details, however, there is no end, and, though they cannot be omitted in a statesman's address, they are not to be criticized in equal detail with any kind of advantage. The general declaration to which both these remarks and the PREMIER's further observations on the housing of the poor and the incidence of taxation led up was of much more value. It is at least as fair a distinction between Conservative policy and the policy which, without any disrespect to Liberal-Unionists, may be called Liberal, to urge that the one is calculated to inspire confidence and the other is not; and Lord SALISBURY's argument might be illustrated and carried out in various directions. Nothing is commoner than for the gutter Gladstonian journals to speak of a man, say, with a quarter of a million a year, as the possessor of a fortune "which, if divided, would diffuse 'happiness among,' and so forth. "What proportion 'of the nation is a quarter of a million of people, and what 'good would a pound a year (that is to say, rather less 'than three farthings a day) do to each even of that small 'fraction?' is a pertinent reply. But it is even more pertinent to urge, as Lord SALISBURY urged, that by dividing the spoils of your capitalist you effectually kill the goose with the golden eggs, and prevent other people from making or keeping fortunes for you to divide. A man will not buy, and expensively cultivate land, if he is constantly liable to have it taken at prairie value. He will not build houses if you decide that his tenant, after being underrented for years, shall acquire a permanent interest in the property to compensate him for his present outlay and future resignation. He will not invest in business if you decide that his workmen shall be helped by the law to extort higher wages from him whenever they choose, and forbidden by the law to work for him, even if they had work to do. He will not invest in stocks and companies if, in addition to these liabilities, he may suddenly have fancy property taxes, fancy rates, and so forth, laid upon him. It is in putting these matters, as well as those others, in his later speeches, concerning the House of Lords and disturbing legislation generally, that Lord SALISBURY can do most good. There was once a somewhat arrogant humourist who defended his adhesion to unpopular ideas by saying "I can believe that; 'and even you do not call me a fool." In the same way Lord SALISBURY, though he does not put things quite so brutally, is a perpetual difficulty and despair to those who would fain associate Conservatism with a lack of intellectual activity or ability. And we ourselves have no doubt whatever that the Toryism which, without being merely "akinetic," takes the true Tory attitude and asks whether rational making the best of things as they are is not better than never-ending experiments and continual fumbling, has a more promising future, as it certainly has a more logical basis, than the perpetual endeavour to "go one 'better' than the last Radical bidder or player. Nor will it be quite an indifferent consideration that, according to observed historical chances, the era of fidget which set in at the end of the last century, was driven back for a little by the Revolutionary wars, and broke out again at their end, may not impossibly be near its close, and that we may live to see an Age of Rest and Reason instead of one of Ransack and Rummage.

IRELAND.

IT is particularly edifying to observe the manner in which the affirmation by the Court for Crown Cases Reserved of the conviction of the prisoner COLL for manslaughter at the Maryborough trials has been received by the Gladstonian press. Even if the points respectively urged by the Crown and on behalf of the convict had been of an equally technical character, the contention that the prisoner should be released because four judges held against five that the conviction was bad, would not have been entitled to much weight. But when, as it happens, the decision of the minority of the Court was admittedly based upon the most strictly technical grounds, and when more than one of the four judges acknowledged in effect that on the moral merits of the case the prisoner was justly convicted, there is a peculiar audacity in the demand that the judgment of the majority should be set aside. What the argument before the nine judges went to establish was practically this—that a piece of documentary evidence, which would unquestionably have sufficed to convict COLL, was wrongly rejected at the trial by the presiding judge; but that, whereas a majority of the Court were of opinion that the judge might legitimately repair his error by subsequently admitting oral evidence to the same effect, and was not bound to exclude true testimony in deference to technical rules of procedure, a minority of the Court held that his error was irreparable, and that technicalities must be allowed to triumph over truth. And this is the ruling, on the strength of which it "is presumed that "Mr. BALFOUR will now scarcely hesitate to order Lord "ZETLAND to release the prisoner"! We should be glad if charity would enable us to assume that those who were thus eager to see Justice tripped up by legal subtleties had really misconceived the drift of the minority judgment. But it is too plain to admit of any such assumption. For it was perfectly clear from the pronouncement of the two judges whose dissent is made the most of—the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE and Chief Baron PALLES—that they entertained no doubt as to the admissibility of the evidence on which COLL was convicted, and that the only ground of their adverse decision was that they could not see their way to approving its admission in the particular form in which the ATTORNEY-GENERAL succeeded in getting it in. Chief Baron PALLES declared that the third question—namely, whether the "oral" testimony was admissible—was "the only substantial one in the case." And Lord Chief Justice MORRIS, in still more definite terms, expressly laid down that "it was open to the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, "and his bounden duty," to put in the deposition of VARILLY, made on the 14th of February, in which COLL's name was mentioned; but that, this having been excluded, the witness's parole statement as to what he had testified to in that deposition was not legally admissible.

The appointment of the distinguished judge whose language we have just quoted to succeed Lord Justice FITZGERALD happens a little unfortunately for the gentle critics of the Irish judiciary in the English Parnellite press. If Sir MICHAEL MORRIS's judgment in favour of COLL had preceded the announcement of his elevation by only two or three days, the newspaper eulogist of the author of that judgment would have had a decent time in which to convert himself into the stern critic of the new Lord Justice of Appeal. But it certainly would have been a little awkward to have extolled the just and upright Irish judge in one column and to have cavilled in an adjoining one at his appointment to his new post. That is a feat to which only the "lightning-change artistes" of Gladstonian journalism are unequal. It may be admitted, however, that they displayed much "flexibility of adaptation"—to use the phrase coined by Mr. MORLEY with prophetic applicability to his present colleagues—in accommodating themselves to the circumstances. It being inconvenient to blacken Sir MICHAEL MORRIS, the next best thing was to paint him as white as possible, and use him as a foil to Mr. PETER O'BRIEN. At the moment of writing the announcement that the ATTORNEY-GENERAL is to succeed to the Lord Chief Justiceship does not appear to have been officially confirmed; but there is no reason that we know of to doubt its accuracy. It is in accordance with the precedents established in such cases both in England and Ireland; and, apart from this, there will be a general disposition among sensible Englishmen to approve of it. Little, it is true, is known of Mr. O'BRIEN in this country, though not less than is usual in the case of Irish law officers without a seat in Parliament; but he is equipped with testimonials of the strongest possible description in the shape of the infamous abuse which has been heaped upon him by United Ireland, and by its followers, haud passibus æquis in this country. We may feel well assured, after reading these tributes, that the late Attorney-General for Ireland has simply done his duty.

To Miss HELEN TAYLOR is due the credit of having supplied the material for the latest, and perhaps the most striking, addition to Mr. BALFOUR's "Complete Letter-writer." Everybody has by this time read it. All who understand the "art of putting things," even the Gladstonians, who abuse when they possess that art, have admired it; and everybody who is capable of perceiving how the exquisitely ridiculous pierces through the intensely serious in the affairs of life—we need not here add "even the Gladstonians," since the faculty is so rare among them as to be a negligible quantity—have laughed at it. Of course the opening given to Mr. BALFOUR by Miss TAYLOR's lecture was an immense one; but that is only the good fortune which so often waits on the artist. Any controversialist who makes such admirable use as he does of his opportunities deserves that the case of two women unfortunately shot by the police in dispersing a riot which took place under Mr. GLADSTONE's administration should be cited by a Gladstonian lady lecturer as a proof that under the demoralizing influences of Mr. BALFOUR's régime the Irish Constabulary have taken to entering huts and stabbing women with bayonets specially constructed for that purpose. Miss TAYLOR's two victims, who lost their lives at Belmullet in October 1881, were not stabbed by the police in the interior of a hut, even with an ordinary regulation bayonet, not to speak of one "sharpened on both sides and at the point." They unhappily fell under the fire of the police, who were at that moment engaged in "defending their lives" against the attack of a crowd of five hundred persons armed "in part with stones and in part with reaping-hooks." In this careful explanation of the real circumstances of a case which concerns his political adversaries alone Mr. BALFOUR displays a contemptuous magnanimity which, to the moral merits of such an attitude, adds that of the most telling controversial effect. He is "constrained by common charity," he says, "to satisfy Miss TAYLOR that no blame attaches to the Government of his predecessors in respect of the loss of life to which she refers." (We wonder what those eminent persons would have done if the position had been reversed.) And in a pregnant sentence, from which it would be an excellent discipline both in politics, morals, and literary composition for a young Gladstonian to evolve its embodied propositions, Mr. BALFOUR concludes with the expression of his hope that this account of the mishap in question will be accepted even by some of the advocates of Home Rule—"not, I need hardly point out to any one acquainted with their canons of belief, because of its inherent probability, but because its acceptance is necessary to exculpate the Government of Mr. GLADSTONE and its rejection of no avail to discredit that of Lord SALISBURY."

Miss HELEN TAYLOR, however, is not the only politician of her party who commits the very serious mistake of shooting at the enemy so unskilfully as to hit her own comrades. The Daily News, the other day, in its eagerness to attack the ATTORNEY-GENERAL for IRELAND, startled its readers—or those of them who were foolish enough to believe what party spite apparently enables less foolish writers to retail—with the preposterous story that Lord Chief Justice MORRIS had charged the first law officer of the Crown in Ireland with "gambling with the lives of men." With the trifling exception that the remark was addressed to the counsel for the prisoner instead of the Crown, and that the former was accused of the somewhat different offence of "gambling for "a verdict," by relying upon an objection on the appeal which they had not raised at the trial, our contemporary's statement may be said to have been substantially accurate. The Lord Chief Justice, however, has been at the pains to correct it through his secretary, and the Daily News appends to his published letter of disclaimer the ingenious explanation that "we had in view a quotation which, in United Ireland, was said to be from a shorthand note 'taken in Court,' and that 'we' thought it safe and prudent to assume, on the strength of the arrangement of the quotation marks, that Sir MICHAEL MORRIS had been guilty of the incredible sally referred to. This is, indeed, touching. We know of people who read even the "words and figures" of United Ireland with considerable caution; but to find anybody who carries trustfulness so far as to pin his faith to its inverted commas is a positive cure for cynicism.

In the meantime, a new occasion for libellous abuse of the administrators of law in Ireland has arisen in the refusal of Mr. MELDON to grant informations against the police-constables charged with the murder of STEPHEN HEFFERNAN, the man who was shot in the Tipperary riots on the day on which bombs—playfully described by the witnesses for the prosecution as "squibs"—were thrown at the Constabulary, and an attempt was made to blow up Mr. SMITH BARRY's rent-office with infernal machines. The magistrate, in giving his decision, held that every reasonable effort had been made by the police to disperse the rioters before firing on them; that there was no evidence of malice on their part, and they ought to be protected against criminal proceedings. This disappointment to the hopes of the enemies of law in Ireland, coinciding as it does with news of the total collapse of the Plan of Campaign on the OLPHERT estate, seems to leave that energetic party in rather a bad way.

THE GENTLEMEN OF FICTION.

IN the Paradise of Fiction, where the really living characters out of novels go before the novels die, the company in the servants' hall must be of the very best. The gentlemen's gentlemen must rally round whatever ambrosia takes the place of biled swarry with turnips in great numbers and admirable spirits. Here shall honest SANCHE PANZA find no physician coming between him and his meat, and that far better than the dish which the old English translator calls "gripes and grumblings." Here shall that great butler of Sir GEORGE DASENT's fancy "have his meals regular," disturbed, perhaps, by Mr. WILKIE COLLINS's BETTERTON and his eternal ROBINSON CRUSOE, and by the peculiarly blunt humours of that Norfolk hind who is buried beside the pillar of eternal fire. There SGANARELLE has for ever the better of DON JUAN in theological argument, and there MASCARILLE, JOB TROTTER, and Mr. SAMUEL WELLER may fight an eternal triangular duel of sharpened wits. It is probable that the great question between MICKY FREE and SAM WELLER for presidency over the gentlemen assembled had to be settled, once for all, in the manner favoured by gentlemen of this degree—that is, with fists. Mr. FREE may have winked at MARY; he was ever an amateur of the sex—but the conflict was inevitable. Strife arises from small occasions, but for great results; and, as SANCHE was never a fighting man, while MASCARILLE was probably ignorant even of the savate, the war for pre-eminence must have been waged between the cockney and the private in the fighting Fourteenth. Most backers will favour Mr. WELLER, who never, it is true, made capture of a French trumpeter in the sight of both armies, but whose knowledge in fisticuffs was extensive and peculiar. In this paradise it may be hoped that the climate is not "too dam cold," but warm enough for JOS SEDLEY's hookabadhar, and for SECUNDRAS DASS, while sufficiently temperate for the Scotch gentlemen, ANDREW FAIRSERVICE, RICHIE MONIPLIES, and Mr. CALEB BALDERSTONE. These, we may presume, keep themselves much to themselves, having been associated in this life with families of the first rank. Indeed, it is not certain that Sir RICHIE MONIPLIES condescends to sit below the salt at all. Whether the presence of MEPHISTOPHELES (not FAUST's, but Mr. Midshipman EASY's) contributes to the general happiness might be doubted, if we were not in the Paradise of Fiction. BENSON the vast, out of Richard Feverel, will still be troubled by a plague of pages, an invasion of boys, from the Fat Boy downwards, unless for the pages of romance there be a special Elysium, a realm of leap-frog and jam-tarts, where BAILEY junior will assuredly hold an honoured place. If the Scotch gentlemen make friends at all, it will be with the worthy valets of MM. PORTHOS, ATHOS, and ARAMIS, with BLAISE and his brethren, who are by no means beneath their own quality. The serving-men of SHAKSPEARE—LAUNCE, with his dog, and LAUNCELOT GOBBO, and ROBIN, FALSTAFF's lad—may share their sack with Mr. WELLER, and partake, not haughtily, of his dog's-nose and half-and-half. It is a delicate question whether the suivantes are there, DORINE and her bevy, who might breed strife in a gathering of men so gallant and so amorous. Probably Major PENDENNIS's Valet MORGAN was blackballed on the proposal of Mr. SMAWKER; he is not fit to associate with such fair good company—more probably he and LITTIMER are in the limbo of fiction. This noble servants' hall is doubtless visited on occasion by JEAMES YELLOWPLUSH in all his glory—nay, he may have chosen to cast in his lot wholly with his earlier comrades. They are not supernumeraries in the world of fiction—they, and the nurse of JULIET and the nurse of ORESTES. But the great days of service are gone, and the novelists of a democratic day add few indeed to this delightful assembly of dear old friends, whose place is assuredly a good place in the Paradise of Fiction.

SQUARETOES AND SQUAREFACE.

IS it quite true that Commerce and Civilization go hand in hand? Always? At a somewhat less enlightened period—for we are always progressing, and fifty years is a long time ago—there was not a doubt of it; but the belief is not allowed to pass unchallenged in these later days. Yet when we look to the Brussels Conference, which is actually sitting at the present moment, we find an answer to the doubting. At the Conference emissaries from most of the great nations of Europe appear, as well as from some of the smaller ones; and what has brought them together? What is their business? No sooner do we ask that question than we perceive that we should rather extend than attenuate our faith in the beneficent agency of Trade. For hitherto belief in the civilizing influences of commercial intercourse has been very much restricted to its effects on distant and barbarous populations. But what do we see here? We see here a most remarkable example of the civilizing, Christianizing influences of commerce on traders themselves. Every nation represented at the Brussels Conference was saturated with civilization and Christianity long before the Conference was thought of. But, excepting the most commercial people (where foreign parts are concerned) on the face of the earth, there was not one who cared “a twopenny d—mn” about the suppression of the slave-trade. Over and over again, every nation of them had been invited to take part in putting down the inhuman traffic in flesh and blood where it appeared that they had some call to do so, or some means and opportunity; yet none responded kindly, spite of the harrowing pictures of cruelty and suffering presented to their view. Even the sympathies of the Portuguese, who have long carried on a considerable traffic in negro lands, remained unawakened; but that may be explained by the circumstance that till the other day there was little or no competition in the dark regions of Africa where their business was mainly carried on. As for the other peoples, they had no such trade at all, or next to none; and therefore, civilized and Christian as they were, their hearts remained untouched.

But now behold a change! As everybody knows, there has been an extraordinary awakening of trade adventure throughout Europe of late; and more particularly, a raging current of commercial enterprise has been directed upon Africa from nearly every European State. It has been like a “rush to the diggings,” as recorded in Californian or Australian story, with the difference that Governments and peoples have made the rush instead of individuals; while the parcelling, and the claiming, and the jumping of claims has been carried out upon a corresponding scale of magnitude. Hence great heart-stirrings have arisen; and, to add to the general emotion, a variety of ferocious native tribes have started up near the seaboard, and yet more of them in the interior, with a view to expel the parcellers and traders. At once all the Continental Powers concerned become animated by these rousing complications. Inspired by the enthusiasm of trade, the scales fall from their eyes. The enormity of the slave traffic looms into view from the darkness of their unregenerate, unadventurous days; and with melting hearts they perceive that nothing will go well in Africa—not only the arrangement of their various claims, not only the maintenance of those claims against savage incursion, but even the sacred right of Man to live unpropertied by Man—without a combination to suppress the hideous traffic in slaves! Thus do we see how the yearning for trade may not only civilize barbaric tribes to whom imports are comparatively unknown, but soften and humanize the heart of the already Christianized exporter.

We can but hope that harmony will attend every session of the Brussels Conference, that no extreme warmth of ambition to exceed in well-doing will disturb its efforts to delimit the various boundaries of operation, and that the result will be to deliver Africa from one of its more terrible afflictions. One of them, we say, for it is scourged by others; and of these, about the most odious and abominable will become a hundredfold worse if the Conference does not look out. It is bad enough as it is; but at present its ravages are confined to the immediate neighbourhood of European colonies and trading stations. Compared with the vast areas of territory which are about to be opened up by Germany, France, Italy, Portugal, Belgium, and Great Britain, these stations occupy but a small space, and the paths therefrom are few and narrow. And what we should like to know is, whether the Brussels Conference will be instructed to put down a European traffic as murderous as the slave-trade itself? Or is it that, while the conscience of all Europe has been shocked at last by slave-trade cruelties committed by gangs of heartless Arabs, it is not yet touched by the devastation deliberately perpetrated by Christian dealers in counterfeit strong waters? The liquor trade in many parts of Africa is the chief trade. Dishonest to the root, it is worse than that as deep as we can go. It pretends to be a trade in cordials; nine-tenths of it is, to the knowledge of those who flourish on it, the sale and distribution of poisons. The extent and destructiveness of the traffic have been brought to light over and over again, as by the Duke of WESTMINSTER in the House of Lords this year. Such stuff it is that our good missionaries of civilization retail to the “poor blacks,” that on the Cape coasts “superior gin” is sold at twopence-half-penny per pint bottle; while “splendid rum” is invoiced at ninepence a gallon! A Mr. JAMES IRVING, of Liverpool, declared a little while ago that “two hundred miles of the West Coast of Africa consume 20,000 tuns of spirits a year; say, twenty ships of a thousand tuns each”; and, says he, “the amazing thing is that all this traffic is conducted in the main by not over a dozen firms, and many of them, I believe, sincere Christians.” Christians, and not without remorse sometimes, even while they offend. Of such must have been a British merchant in Sierra Leone, who lately said of himself, “I have on the road now thousands of gallons of rum, and several thousand demijohns of gin, bound for the Northern River countries, where I carry on the greater part of my business. The liquor traffic destroys body and soul together, such slaves have they become to the white man's rum and gin. Rum and gin are their incessant demand and cry. The traffic has so debased them that everywhere they neglect their own comfort.” On the Kru coast may be seen, says Mr. JOSEPH THOMSON, the famous traveller, “a kind of Hades, peopled by brutalized human beings whose punishment seems to be a never-ending thirst for drink.” And not only does the filthy poison destroy the ignorant wretches to whom it is sold, but the traffic in it excludes wholesome and honourable trade. “From the moment the traveller leaves Liverpool” for the African coast “he finds himself in an atmosphere of poisonous spirits. It pervades every corner of the vessel in which he takes passage. He sees the gin and rum disgorged from its capacious holds at port after port, and he will almost look in vain for a bale of Manchester cotton.” This, also, is Mr. THOMSON's testimony. Elsewhere we find that, whereas a certain Glasgow firm used to employ a large number of looms weaving cloth for the African market, now it has not one. “A trader in the Calabar river wrote recently to his principals to send no more cloth—drink was the only article in demand.” In the Niger regions the natives traffic almost for drink alone; and we read that in one Portuguese opium factory on the Zambesi the workpeople are paid in spirits.

Thus it appears that, even from the merely commercial point of view, and putting aside those feelings of humanity which are so thoroughly if tardily revolted by the horrors of the slave-trade, it might be well for the august partitioners of Africa to look into this matter a little. It cannot be an advantage for commerce in general that one kind of trader should destroy every other; especially when, at the same time, he poisons down whole populations, who, while they cease, by dying out, to be consumers even of "the white man's gin," drink themselves out of all industrial energy meantime. And, though it is undeniable that enormous quantities of destructive liquor are sent from England, it is notorious that yet larger quantities of stuff more cheap and deadly still are sold from Germany as well as other Continental countries; and, meanwhile, there at Brussels sit the representatives of these nations, painfully considering how a traffic not one whit more odious or more dreadful in its consequences shall be extinguished. Unless the Portuguese bear some share of the guilt, no European nation is responsible for the African slave-trade. This other traffic was started by some and is continued by all; and it has been truly said that, beginning in fraud, it ends in nothing less than murder in disguise. Can nothing, then, be done to put a stop to it? Or is it intended that, while the Arab slave-dealer shall be driven from his cruel business with one hand, the other shall make neat new paths and undisturbed new markets all over the continent for "sincere Christians" who exterminate by agencies more debasing than slavery itself? If so, if nothing is to be done to destroy that most fraudulent and most murderous traffic (and of course much can be done), how monstrously hypocritical will the Brussels Conference look! It has something of that appearance already; but what then?

STUDENTS AT GLASGOW.

THE life of a Scotch Professor has long been a happy one. What the Commission may do with him is unknown, but the tendency of reformers is not to increase the joys of professors, but rather to dock their incomes and abridge their holidays. Whether the performances of the students at Glasgow added to their felicity is a matter of individual temperament. To hold a strong position in the face of overwhelming numbers no doubt represents a brave man's ideal of bliss. HORATIUS COCLES on the Bridge, the five who barred the gates of Hougomont, UMSLOPOGAAS on the staircase, and Mr. RAMSAY at the doors of the hall where the graduates were capped in Glasgow University, no doubt enjoyed themselves extremely. But all professors are not tall men of their hands, and the disappointed candidates for the Greek and English chairs may now console themselves. In the recesses of their studies they need not fear incursions of students armed with sticks and with the hose of fire-engines.

It is not prudent for observers at a distance to give judgment on the wrongs of students and the rights of professors. At Glasgow, it seems, as elsewhere, the ceremony of conferring degrees has been a kind of saturnalia. Even at Oxford it was found necessary to try for some kind of order and decency at Commemoration. Men whom nobody ever saw at other times and seasons, on Cowley Marsh or on the river, used to fill the galleries, and yell their senseless witticisms. At Glasgow it was of old the custom to throw peas, and, we believe, halfpence, and those peas were wont to sting. For this, we presume, or for other reasons, the professors determined to shut the students, or the majority of them, out of the hall on the day of degrees. To assemble outside and howl was exactly what these Peris were certain to do at the gates of Paradise. Professor RAMSAY and other professors displayed great vigour and presence of mind. In yon strait pass a thousand might well be stopped by three, and stopped they were. But the students had sticks; with these they belaboured the door till a panel cracked, then they rent it out, smashed the other panels, got hold of the water-hose, with which some thinkers believe that mobs can be quelled, and used the limpid element for their own revolutionary purposes. The gallant professors were very much drenched, and in the evening the students held noisy assemblies. They did not actually make a vacancy by hanging any professor on a lantern, but their conduct was highly unacademic. Their more thoughtful members invited them to constitutional courses, and reminded them that they had a representative Council. Their blood was up; they yelled; the cry was Clubs; and by this time it is to be hoped that they are rather ashamed of themselves. Members of other Scotch Universities who have heard very much about the superior discipline of Glasgow may perhaps smile a worldly smile. We don't drench professors and break in doors at Aberdeen, Edinburgh, and St. Andrews, they may say. But it is premature to boast; disorder is contagious, and professors may yet be "swum" in the Witch's Lake, dipped in the heretical well of St. Leonard's, or even burned (in effigy) where pious Mr. GEORGE WISHART suffered under the Cardinal's windows.

College riots are things that will happen, especially when there is snow on the ground. An Edinburgh "bicker" once demanded military interference; and in LEVER's days there appears to have been a charge of dragoons in Dublin about once a week. But these were town and gown squabbles; it is more melancholy when the gown is divided against itself. Except for an annual explosion or so, the Glasgow students have a good character for order, and it may be trusted that order has long been restored, and that "Warsaw is tranquil." Nobody objects to a little banter and noise on "capping" days; but there is a length to which St. Mungo's students should not go, and perhaps they will recognize that they have gone it.

SCATHOLD.

WITHIN the last few days the Scotch papers have reported and commented on a decision of the Crofters Commission, which is indeed deserving of some attention, if only for the illustration it affords of the consequences which follow on interfering in old-established methods of conducting business. The subject of the decision is the scathold (or, as it is now commonly spelt, scattald) rights of the Shetland Crofters. The meaning of "scat," and "wattee," and "hawkhen," and "hagalef" is doubtless not very familiar at this end of the island—not even to those who know their SCOTT well enough to quote him at will. And yet scathold, or scattald, is an easy thing to understand. It is simply a right of pasture on the hill-ground—the alp—of a Shetland estate. It is shared by all the Crofters in the township, and enters into their rent. Nothing could well be more simple or easy. As long as there was a central authority and the parties interested were left to settle their claims by the "higgling of the market" it was regulated by use and wont, or by compromise, in the way most things are. Probably, or even certainly, there were disputes. Landlords and Crofters differed as to the number of sheep a given pasture could support. Crofters quarrelled among themselves as to what proportion of the total they were respectively entitled to feed. Still, in the long run, the balance of interests led to the formation of a working compromise; and, in the last resort, the authority of the landlord could be appealed to. A tenant who abused his rights could be evicted, and that prospect acted as a check on him.

The Crofters Act has altered all this. By giving the Crofters fixity of tenure, it has removed the one effectual means of stopping encroachment by the Crofter, either on the rights of the landlord or of his fellow-Crofters. The Commission took the scathold-right into account when it fixed the judicial rent, but it did not specify how far it extended. There is, therefore, nothing, as the law now stands, to prevent the Crofters from sending as many sheep on to the scathold as will exhaust the pasture. The landlord cannot evict them, and the Commission has not inherited his power of eviction. Neither is it only the landlord who is sacrificed; for the removal of the check imposed by the liability to suffer eviction has made it possible for the Crofters to eat one another up. These tenants differ greatly in position from one another. Many of them are sailors or fishermen, who take a croft consisting of a house, a potato patch, and grass for a cow. They either do not want to use the scathold right at all, or keep half a dozen sheep, from whose wool they make their homespun clothes. But some of them are farmers who wish to make the utmost they can out of the land. It is easy to understand that these men are greatly tempted to abuse their right of pasture, to the damage both of the landlord and of their fellow-Crofters. This is what on a general view of human nature might have been considered as probable, and it is what has happened. Therefore, the landlords have appealed to the Commission to define the rights of the Crofters, as they have fixed the rent. This the Commissioners have declined to do, on the ground that, in "fixing the fair rents, due regard was had to the amount of stock which the

"scattald could probably carry," and that a yearly ascertainment of the stock would be beyond their powers. The practical result of this decision is self-evident. The Commissioners, in fact, confess that they can find no means of checking an abuse of their rights on the part of the Crofters. They, indeed, had a regard to what the scattald could bear; but they did not compel the Crofters to show any such regard, and confess that they have no means of compelling them. It would seem, therefore, that they can do no more than stand by while the Crofters starve one another's flocks off the pasture and ruin the landlord's property. There is no check on the Crofters except their own moderation or good sense; and these virtues on the part of thirty-nine may be of no avail if a fortieth is grasping and penny-wise. No doubt a remedy of some kind will be supplied by the nature of things. General loss of the flocks will be the punishment of excessive use of the pasture. But, as even so good a Liberal as the Scotsman very pertinently points out, the loss of their flocks and the exhaustion of the pastures will hardly bring about that improvement in the condition of the Crofters which the Commission was established to achieve. A more complete demonstration of the futility of all efforts to better the condition of a people by legislative interference has never been given than this. The Commission has not made the Crofters more prosperous by destroying the power of the landlord, and it has opened the door to a new abuse by which both owner and tenant may and must suffer in the long run. It is obvious that things cannot be left where they are. The old balance has been destroyed and another must be found. The best course of all would be the repeal of the Crofters Act; but, if that is not done, then the Commission must go on to define the rights of that fixity of tenure which they have conferred. In short, legislative interference will breed more legislative interference, and will go on breeding.

A MUZZLED MEETING.

THERE is a good deal more common sense in the world than fanatics would lead us to suppose. One symptom of its prevalence is the dismal collapse of the great dog agitation. We are so much governed in London that the authorities were a long time making up their minds who was to bell the cat, or rather muzzle the dog. The Privy Council said it was the duty of the County Council, and the County Council said it was the duty of the Privy Council. Finally, the Privy Council found a Major, and the Major has, after some not unnatural friction, succeeded in accomplishing his allotted task. The dogs are perfectly comfortable, their owners obey the law, and something at last is being done to remove a terrible plague. Unfortunately, the law is imperfect, and fails to apply that universal compulsion which could alone effect an entire cure. Rabies may still be imported into the capital by rustic dogs who have been unduly neglected, and in this way all the precautions taken in the metropolitan district may be suddenly rendered of no avail. If Sir HENRY ROSCOE re-introduces his Bill next Session, it will be supported from both sides of the House, and ought to become an Act. Meanwhile partial muzzling has done a great deal of good, and deaths from hydrophobia in London have almost ceased. In these circumstances, the Dog-owners' Protection Association thought it expedient and opportune to call a meeting at the Westminster Palace Hotel "for the purpose of discussing the present regulations with regard to dogs now in force in London and the neighbourhood, and to consider the advisability of asking the Minister of Agriculture to receive a deputation on the subject." What protection the owners of dogs require, and how this Association supplies it to them, does not appear. The muzzle is intended and operates for the protection of the public, including those who possess dogs, and of the dogs themselves. If every one who kept a dog were required to wear a muzzle, there would be a good deal more significance in the title of this Society than there is now. The rational conclusion at which the meeting finally arrived may perhaps prevent the deputation to Mr. CHAPLIN from keeping its appointment. Otherwise he will have no difficulty in explaining to these false friends of a noble animal that scientific and practical opinion is agreed in holding the muzzle essential to the welfare of the canine race. A dog has more chances of being bitten, and is less able to defend itself from other dogs, than a man. Dogs would clamour for muzzles if they had the same means of knowledge as the members of the Dog-owners' Protection Association.

The amendment ultimately carried was very different from the resolution originally proposed. The amendment, moved by Mr. VICTOR HORSLEY, was to the effect "That, inasmuch as the orders for the muzzling of dogs have been most successful in stamping out rabies, both at home and abroad, this meeting hopes the regulations will be continued in force until the disease is entirely eradicated from the country." Nothing could be better than this motion, and it is most satisfactory that a chance assemblage in a public room should have unhesitatingly adopted it in preference to the absurd proposition laid down by Mr. CANDY. This learned Queen's Counsel objects to muzzling because mad dogs are not muzzled. Does Mr. CANDY object to vaccination because it is not performed upon people who are suffering from the small-pox? Or to tonics, because they are not given to patients in extremis? Or to surgery, because it is of no use when mortification has set in? The Bishop of ELY, who presided over the meeting, and sympathized with its object, was, nevertheless, compelled to declare the success of the amendment. The Bishop of ELY is an excellent prelate, and made an admirable Prolocutor for the Lower House of Convocation. But he does not seem to know much about dogs, or at least he had not much to say about them. He confined himself to criticizing a circular which described the members of his Association as "anti-vivisectionists," and further said that they were "animated by a hatred of science." Of course the Bishop does not hate science any more than Mr. CANDY hates law. But Mr. CANDY hates a particular law, and the Bishop will not accept the strictly scientific deduction that, if no dog can bite, hydrophobia must die out. The meeting wisely decided that the prevention of hydrophobia was more important than the so-called protection of dog-owners.

THE MINERS' CONFERENCE.

IT is to be regretted that the political instinct of the Miners' delegates recently assembled at the Newport Conference is not as sound as their practical judgment on their own affairs. They have had the wisdom to resist the pressure which has been put upon them from some quarters to give the word prematurely for a general strike in the collieries at the beginning of the new year; yet they are unable to perceive that the arguments against the legislation which they demand are arguments of a precisely similar nature to those which prevailed with them in the matter of the strike. The reason why counsels of moderation gained the day in that matter was simply because, to put it plainly, the Conference agreed that it was unwise to begin a battle in which victory would be more than doubtful. The colliery proprietors are united in their resolution to resist any further reduction, for the present at all events, in the hours of underground labour, and have so declared themselves at their recent meeting in London. On the other hand, the miners are by no means equally unanimous in the resolve to go out on strike to obtain the minimum. Too many of them have got all they want in this direction already, and their representatives evidently fear that to call upon these contented spirits to come out might have results as negative as HOTSPUR anticipated for the incantations of OWEN GLENDOWER. Mr. FENWICK (Northumberland) stated, at the first day's sitting of the Conference, that "the question only affected the boys in his own county, as with them no adult worked more than eight hours a day." The Chairman of the Conference, Mr. PICKARD, M.P., said "they had not two per cent. in Yorkshire working more than eight hours a day, and before his men came out he would like to have some guarantee of general support." Again, the attitude of the South Wales miners seems to have been doubtful; and, in short, considering that, as the Chairman put it, they had 200,000 men, either directly or indirectly, opposed to taking trade action in the matter, it would certainly have been imprudent on the part of the Conference to have passed any "fighting resolution."

It is a pity, however, that they did not content themselves with "hereby agreeing to adjourn the question for a short time, and to refer it back again to the districts for further consideration." Instead of stopping here, they went on to resolve that, at the same time, every district and county shall use every means to press their local member of Parliament to support an Eight Hours Bill. It is, of course, an easy matter enough to do this; but the question for them, as Mr. BURT, in his judicious, but we fear quite ineffectual, speech, pointed out to them, is whether they will really serve their cause by this mode of procedure. "In the mining districts," said Mr. BURT, "they could compel their Parliamentary representatives to support the Eight Hours movement; but let them find out how many seats they would command." He added that he was perfectly sure that they would get what they wanted "much more speedily and effectively" if they depended on themselves and their organizations rather than on the House of Commons. That they will get it much more effectively by organization—in the sense, that is to say, of getting it in the only way which can ensure them against victory proving more disastrous than defeat—it ought to be possible to convince them; but as to Mr. BURT's "more speedily" we do not feel quite so sure. Mr. BURT has probably contented himself with counting the number of Gladstonians whom he knows or believes to be opposed to the Eight Hours legislation. But perhaps the delegates have reflected, for their own part, on the number of Gladstonians, now so called, who four years ago were equally opposed, so far as professions went, to Home Rule; and, taking the "infinite squeezability" of these gentlemen as a truth no less philosophically certain than that of the infinite divisibility of matter, they may plausibly enough have persuaded themselves that squeezing Gladstonians into supporters of legislation they have declared against will be a speedier way of limiting the hours of labour than organizing themselves to obtain what they want by "the higgling of the market." What is so discouraging in the matter is the apparent hopelessness of convincing them that the possibility of getting it in this latter way is the only security that the advantage they are contending for could not be ruinous alike to the employers and to themselves. The limit of what the labourer can demand—and, of course, we assume that reduction of hours is not to be accompanied by any reduction of wages—is and must be ultimately fixed by what the employer can afford to give; and how can this possibly be ascertained if the State steps in to say, in effect, that he shall give so much, whether he can afford it or not?

THE PLUMBER.

WHEN the enterprising plumber's not a plumbing, he dines in the Fishmongers' Hall. This must be a great satisfaction to those who employ him, and who, after paying a heavy bill, are flooded with dirty water, or drenched with sewer gas. Of course, however, the plumbers who entertained the LORD MAYOR and the PRESIDENT of the LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD and the SOLICITOR-GENERAL are plumbers of the best type, who adopt what Lord GRIMTHORPE calls the autogenous system of soldering, and are otherwise disposed to learn the details of their own business from His Lordship. The Master of the Worshipful Company of Plumbers, in his very interesting speech, drew a most attractive picture of what plumbing may become. The plumber of the future will be a sort of Admirable CRICHTON, plus a great many accomplishments of which that historic or traditional personage never heard. He will be equally well versed in the scientific basis and in the practical superstructure of his profession. He will have taken high honours in a competitive examination, or he will have little chance of being called in to respectable houses. He will have been subjected almost from his cradle to a severe course of that distressing fad known as technical education. Chemistry and metallurgy will be his lightest amusements. He will take all drainage to be his province. Nor will a sceptical public be left to take any of these virtues and qualifications on trust. They will be attested by a certificate, and to question the infallibility of certificates is to flounder in the region of pure Pyrrhonism. Mr. BISHOP, the Chief Plumber of the day, invokes the aid of Parliament to facilitate the task of finishing the plumber. But Mr. BISHOP seems to be perfectly capable of finishing the plumber for himself. In Scotland and the North of England the plumber, it seems, is already what he should be; for are not "twenty-six counties covered by the organization"? and is not organization as wonder-working a word as Mesopotamia itself? This superiority of the frozen North to the freezing South will be extremely gratifying to all Londoners, who have long felt that somewhere must exist the perfect plumber; but not here, as Mrs. HEMANS would say—not here. For the metropolitan plumber does sometimes make mistakes—Diruit, ædificat, mutat quadrata rotundis—and occasionally he reverses the process in an inconvenient way. He sunders what should be united, and unites what should be kept asunder. In constructing cisterns he provides, with misdirected benevolence, a home for the blackbeetle. But, if it is difficult to live with the plumber, it is impossible to live without him.

Mr. BISHOP exclaims, like a late politician, "Register, register, register." A registered plumber will, he thinks, meet every requirement, or, in familiar language, do the trick. Certainly Mr. BISHOP has a good deal to say for his movement. It is "the only instance, on a large scale, in which the masters and operatives in any trade have combined to advance technical education among their members; it is the only instance of a large body of trade unionists giving their support to a system of registration based upon tests of qualification; and it is the only instance of the members of an important craft seeking the co-operation of the public authorities in rendering their craftsmen more serviceable to the public." It is not the only instance, by a good many, in which the representative of a flourishing trade has congratulated the country upon the possession of such excellent artists. Mr. BISHOP's words of hope and encouragement are not the less welcome because they were the more needed. The public in general are apt to bear with fortitude, and even with levity, the sorrows of members of Parliament. People, they reflect, who do not relish the House of Commons can keep out of it. It is not like the workhouse, or the House of Lords, into which men are driven by circumstances over which they have no control. Therefore, Mr. RITCHIE's pathetic lament over "the foul smells with which the atmosphere of certain parts of the House is redolent" falls somewhat flat upon the ear. But the Court of Appeal is a different pair of sleeves. It would, perhaps, be too much to say that every judge, or even every Lord Justice, is regarded with personal affection by the community. Nor, indeed, is it necessary to go that extreme length. It is sufficient to observe that suitors have real or imaginary grievances, and that they desire to see those grievances redressed. When one division of the Court of Appeal is closed by the operation of a bad air, not only does Lord Justice COTTON suffer in his health, but litigants suffer in their purses, nor are errors and excesses of the Divisional Courts corrected. Mr. BISHOP promises to change all that, and we only hope that his beneficent exertions may be also applied to private dwellings, especially those of the poor, who cannot help themselves. One of Mr. BISHOP's suggestions is rather alarming. He states that the intervention of the Legislature is necessary "for various financial and other matters." Is the plumber to be paid twice over? Must one first remunerate him as a householder, and then subsidize him as a taxpayer?

THE FISHERY DIFFICULTY.

MR. STAVELEY HILL'S letter in the Times of Thursday may serve to remind some of those who would greatly prefer to forget it that the Fishery difficulty in Behring Sea is not settled yet. Mr. HILL reports the state of the question as he saw it in British Columbia. Unfortunately, it is just what it was last year. Now, as then, the Alaska Company is making claims which we do not admit, and which are flagrantly contradictory to the avowed principles of the United States, to monopolize the seal fishery in Behring Sea, and in no small part of the ocean outside it apparently. Now, as then, British vessels are liable to be captured by U.S. Revenue boats; and not only so, but to have their cargoes taken out of them and confiscated, without even the show of judicial proceedings before an Admiralty Court. Russia, too, has been lending a hand. A Columbian schooner has been seized six miles at sea, off Copper Island, taken into "Petropaulovski or Vladivostok," and there sunk, while her crew has been "shipped to Nagasaki." No effectual protest has been made by HER MAJESTY'S Government against these proceedings. Neither Russia nor the United States has received such a despatch as has just been sent to Portugal. The circumstances alter cases of this kind. There is thus every probability that things will go on as before. We are, therefore, not surprised to hear that there is discontent among the sealers of British Columbia and throughout Canada at large, and some complaint that the British cruisers in Esquimalt are more ornamental than useful.

However inconvenient the Canadian view may be to the Foreign and Colonial Offices, it is natural. The claim of the Alaska Company is, indeed, extraordinary. It is a repetition of a Russian claim made a little less than seventy years ago, and then rejected in a tone of indignant remonstrance by Mr. QUINCY ADAMS, who wanted to know "What are the grounds of right, upon principles generally recognized by the laws and usages of nations, which can warrant these claims and regulations?" Circumstances have altered the case here, too. Now Mr. BLAINE approves claims and regulations made by an American Company for its own benefit which were indignantly remonstrated against by Mr. QUINCY ADAMS when they were made by Russians. Mr. BLAINE enforces them by the loan of U.S. Revenue boats to the Company, and England does not talk in the style of Mr. QUINCY ADAMS. This being so, what is to be done? Mr. STAVELEY HILL, fresh from British Columbia, rather inclines to the opinion that something energetic ought to be done. The Times is astonished at such martial language from a legal gentleman, and is inclined to think that there is no such need. It relies, with polite confidence, on the influence of public opinion in America. The claim of the Alaska Company is, it feels, so monstrous, and has obtained such a very small measure of approval in America, that it cannot be maintained. Besides, if the matter were brought before the Supreme Court, or even an American Court of Admiralty, good and prompt justice would soon be done. We confess we cannot quite share the confidence of the "leading journal," and for various reasons. If public opinion in the States is hostile to the claim of the Alaska Company, and is likely to influence Mr. BLAINE, it would have done so long ago. We do not think it will so influence him, and the ground for our belief is this—that, while very little or nothing is to be gained for any party in the States by disavowing the Alaska Company, a great deal is to be gained by treating British subjects with injustice, and the British Government with insolence. The Irish vote is to be gained, and that will have more influence on Mr. BLAINE—who knows its value, and is a very typical American of the kind which holds that rudeness to England is the noblest form of assertion of the national dignity—than any mere mugwump notions of justice and international dignity. As for what the Supreme Court might say, we have no doubt it would be admirable if the question is ever brought before it. But how is that to be done? American Admiralty Courts may be models of fair play; but, as a matter of fact, the only American Admiralty judge who has been appealed to hitherto, the gentleman at Sitka, has said ditto to the Alaska Company very briskly. He has even gone the length of treating a telegraphic order from Washington with contempt. With these facts before us, we doubt whether much good will come within any reasonable time from waiting for the justice of America to set things right. More good would come of the stringent measures hinted at by that martial Q.C., Mr. STAVELEY HILL. Besides, we confess that platitudes of this kind, which is exceedingly common in the mouths of judicious politicians and judicious newspapers, does a little raise our gorge. It would be so much more honest to tell the British Columbians at once that Russia and the United States are far too strong to be talked to as if they were Portugal; that an outlying British colony must not expect the British Empire to risk a quarrel with awkward customers for its sake as readily as it will snub a poor little fifth-rate European Power. To be sure, honesty of this kind would not sound magnanimous, and might raise an ugly feeling in British Columbia and the Dominion at large. The worst of it is, however, that the colonists are perfectly capable of seeing the truth, whether we put it into words for them or not—which again leads up to the reflection that it is a sad thing to have the responsibility of empire and not to have the courage to bear its burden.

SCHOOL BOARD BUILDING.

A NEWSPAPER controversy is not the most satisfactory way of getting at truth. In particular, it is a very bad way when it is attempted in a newspaper which makes a business of encouraging sensational correspondences on any subject that incontinent amateurs can be induced to write about. Gush divided into sections by flaming headings is not what sensible people will look to for evidence. One entertains a certain distrust of the measure and accuracy of the language used, to say nothing more. For that reason, if for no other, it is as well to wait a little before accepting all as good that is upcome in the Daily Telegraph on the subject of the School Board Scandals. For the rest, as Messrs. WALL Brothers have pointed out, the alleged worst case of all is to come before a judge and jury. When it does, we may possibly get at the truth, or at least may discover in the conflict of scientific witnesses, of whom there will assuredly be no lack, that the truth is not easy to get at. In the meantime, some part of it has leaked out, no doubt, in the Daily Telegraph. Whether they prove all Mr. LOBB thinks they do we are not prepared to assert; but his cases do prove something. He quotes too many examples of bad drains and bad building to leave any doubt that many of the imposing masses of bricks and mortar raised for the School Board at the expense of the ratepayers are monuments of the bad calculation of modern architects and the sins of modern contractors.

Morals of various kinds will be, and have been, drawn from this revelation—which, by the way, has not taken away the breath of a good few observers, by coming upon them as any kind of surprise. One of the morals which we note with pleasure as a proof of the honesty and thoroughness of a part of the press is, that here we see the handiwork of the Tory obscurantist. He—wretch that he is!—built the schools badly; first, because he hates the people and rejoices to poison their young families with sewer gas; and, secondly, because he hates education, and would like to see the palaces in which it is dispensed fall on the heads of schoolmistress and pupils in utter ruin. To be sure, Tory obscurantists were not in a majority on the Board when those buildings were set up; but that does not matter. If the Tory did not do these things, he ought to have done them, and ought in any case to be accused of having done them. For our part, we are inclined to find a cause for these "scandals" which has no immediate connexion with politics. The fact that the schools were built all at once, and in a great hurry, is, in our opinion, enough to account for a great deal of blundering. There is no business of which it is truer than it is of building, that the slow fire makes the sweet malt. Hasty building on a large scale is almost always bad building. When, in addition, the work is done by contract, the risk of badness is greatly increased. Contract work is very particularly apt to be work done at a rush, and though the materials be ever so good, they are not used with that infinite care in the details which is required to make a really solid building. The contract system has a delusive appearance of cheapness about it; but as it is worked it commonly makes it the interest of the contractor to do as little as he can, and therefore it is dear in the long run. Now, without committing actual fraud, a builder can so build that his work stands inspection, but will not stand wear and tear, wind and weather. We shall be somewhat surprised if, on inquiry, it does not prove that this is what has happened with School Board schools. The evil might have been avoided by constant vigilant inspection; but, unfortunately, no body of persons could well be less competent to inspect than the School Board—and that whether the majority is Tory or Radical, or belongs to any other party. Inspection, to be efficient, presupposes both time and knowledge. The members of the School Board have neither one nor the other to give. As they are certain to share the miserable "democratic" unwillingness of the day to pay competent persons to devote their time to them, their inspection is badly done. Naturally, under these circumstances, the contractor is allowed to make frequent use of that most immoral phrase "This will do." Then small oversights, small miscalculations, small dishonesties, creep in. They may not show when the building is passed by an inspector, who very likely looks over them as hastily as they were committed; but they show to some purpose after a few years' use. This has certainly been the history of many acres of building erected for others than the School Board, and we are quite prepared to believe that it has been the history of their work likewise. It is the very natural result of the system of allowing incompetent persons to have the direction of practical work simply because they are elected for some very different purpose. They wish to do things on the cheap, and, therefore, employ a contractor whose interest it is to do as little as may be for his money. Then they employ somebody of no mark who can also be got cheap to look after the contractor. When this turns out to be a very costly way, indeed, of getting your work done there is a loud outcry—which again proves that there is a very dim comprehension in the public mind of the conditions on which alone good work can be done.

THE RESPITE OF LAURIE.

IT was announced last Thursday evening that the Provost of Greenock had received an official communication that morning that LAURIE, the man recently convicted of the murder of the English tourist, Mr. ROSE, had been respited. The convict, it was further stated, "was made very cheerful" by the receipt of the news, although when the intelligence was communicated to him he manifested no particular emotion, but confined himself to merely saying "Thank you." Before the public, however, can either share his cheerfulness or re-echo his thanks, it will be necessary to know a little more than we do at present as to the causes of his reprieve. The first impression, in some minds, may possibly have been that the advisers of the Crown felt uncertain as to the correctness of the verdict on the facts of the case, and thought it just possible that the prisoner's account of the manner in which Mr. ROSE met his death may have been true. Nor is it even now quite certain that this is not one of the assumptions on which the respite has been based. Seeing, however, that it was LAURIE's own behaviour subsequently to ROSE's death which threw discredit on his explanation of that event, it will probably have been concluded by most people, on a little reflection, that the acceptance of some theory of his mental unsoundness must have been a condition precedent to the step which Lord LOTHIAN has taken. And that conclusion was confirmed by the promptly following report that the reprieve had been granted by the SECRETARY for SCOTLAND on the strength of the report of medical experts that the prisoner was of unsound mind.

We presume, however, that the public wish to be let a little more into official confidence. It may be a purely speculative curiosity, but we should certainly like to know what is the exact view taken at the Scotch Office as to the death of Mr. ROSE, and in what precise way LAURIE's insanity, assuming him to be insane, has operated to bring about his reprieve. Has it, that is to say, been treated as exculpatory or merely as explanatory? Is it the official theory that he killed Mr. ROSE, but that, being of unsound mind, he is not criminally responsible? Or does that theory start with the assumption that Mr. ROSE's death was, as LAURIE protested in his defence, accidental, and that the latter's insanity only comes in to explain his flight and concealment after the accident took place? Our curiosity on this point may, as we have said, be rebuked as purely speculative; but we are not disposed at present to submit without protest to that reproof. On the contrary, it seems to us to be very material to know which of these two alternative reasons for reprieving the prisoner has in fact been adopted. It is notable that the difficulty which the ordinary mind would experience in assenting to the former theory is more considerable than it would prove in the case of the latter. But, for our own part, we must admit that we have seen nothing in the case from first to last to raise any presumption of LAURIE's insanity, and that we trust the public will be informed, not only of the grounds on which certain medical experts unnamed have discovered a defence for him which was not, as far as we remember, so much as suggested on his behalf at the trial, but of the complete theory of his connexion with the death of Mr. ROSE, as that theory has definitely taken shape in the mind of the SECRETARY for SCOTLAND.

MR. STANLEY'S DISCOVERIES.

THE geographical and ethnological results of Mr. Stanley's expedition are as yet very imperfectly known, and can hardly be comprehended fully until his extended narrative, with such maps as he may be able to give, are in the hands of readers. What he has learnt appears to concern mainly two different lines of country—the riverine territory of the Aruwihimi or Ihuru, and the route from the Albert Nyanza, between the other two great lakes, the Victoria and that which used to be known by the name of Muta N'zige, but has now acquired rank in the family as Albert Edward (Edward by itself would have been better and more distinctive) southeastwards. This lake, by the way, though it seems to be of great importance, Mr. Stanley now thinks to be less in extent than the Muta N'zige was held to be. In regard to the first district Mr. Stanley's thrice-repeated journeys have not furnished him with very much information, owing to the nature of the country and the character of its inhabitants. His picture of the dark belt may have something of "newspaperese" about it; but the plain facts are sufficiently uninviting. The country would appear to be for the most part swampy forest, full of unwholesome and poisonous things, and curiously unprovided (though it is fair to remember that the large scale on which African exploration is carried on makes rather excessive demands on the resources of any such country) with game or edible products of any kind. As for the inhabitants, we must, of course, again make considerable allowances. The savage who does not like great caravans of armed strangers invading his territory and eating up (even if they do it in a friendly way and by fair barter) his not too abundant supplies, who perhaps confuses them with the raiding Arabs and Man-yuema, may be très méchant, but he is not exactly unnatural. But Mr. Stanley, though he may have blackened his friends from Yambuya to Kavalli's, can hardly have done more than deepen their natural colour. The Arab raiders of Ugarrowa's type are probably, as a class, as great scoundrels as any that the world has seen since the palmy days of buccaneering. Cannibals (though cannibalism is itself a pretty clear sign of the insufficient supply of other food) are not agreeable people either, nor are "crafty little dwarfs," though we own that we should dearly like to hear the Wambutti or Mombuttoo account of the "violent large giants." It would seem very improbable that much will for a long time be done with these quarters. The in some way corresponding districts of South America, on the Amazon, the Madeira, and the Rio Negro, have been known for hundreds of years, are far more accessible from the outer world, are much better provided with food, and are inhabited by comparatively unwarlike tribes where they are inhabited at all; yet great part of the Brazilian provinces of Matto Grosso and Amazonas are in reality terra incognita. And so, no doubt, will Ihuria, or whatever it pleases geographers to name the scene of Mr. Stanley's adventures and sufferings, long be.

The latter part of his route, of which we have at present still fewer details, is much more interesting and much more promising. Lakes, rivers of the character of the Semliki, and mountains—those Mountains of the Moon, as frequently slain and as constantly resurgent as John Barleycorn himself—are much better features than swamps and forests. The Muta N'zige or Edward Nyanza must be not only an interesting feature in itself, but offers a highway to the large, and at present almost absolutely unknown, district between its western bank and the Upper Congo above Stanley Falls. The mountain region to the east of it ought to provide a sanatorium for Equatorial Africa, and may supply new sources of wealth. In regard to another statement of Mr. Stanley's as to the approximation of the Victoria Nyanza and Lake Tanganyika, it is not quite so clear in what way we are to understand it. It may mean that the Nyanza itself, though it was understood to have been explored all round, has bays yet undiscovered, and the half-conjectural location in the present maps of bodies of water—Akanyaru, and so forth—might explain it in that way. Perhaps, on the other hand, it means that the ordinary map interval is not true to the actual ground. However this may be, it is clear that the region west and south-west of the Victoria Nyanza is not the least promising of African regions. The "cold winds from the mountains" are an inseparable incident of tropical countries where mountains exist, and they seem to constitute the chief, if not the only, climatic or geographic drawback, unless the presence of salt lakes (in itself, the salt being eatable, a great advantage) indicates desert land somewhere about. Nor would the natives, from Mr. Stanley's account, warlike as they are sometimes, appear to be either as savage or of as degraded a type as those further west and north. The British East African Company ought to strain every nerve to get this tract of country under its influence, both in order to tap the local resources and in order to create the markets now so much required for English trade. Perhaps the best preliminary means of doing this would be the restoration of some sort of order in Uganda, short of which neither the navigation of the lake nor travelling along its shores can be safe or profitable. This once done, the opening up of the Edward Nyanza country and the recovery of the head-waters of the Nile from the Mahdists and other savages, might proceed hand in hand, and would be at once a crown and a justification of English interference in Egypt.

NOTES FROM THE ZOO.—LEMURS.

NEARLY one-half of the wall-cages in the Monkey House are occupied by lemurs, which attract much less attention from ordinary visitors than do their neighbours and distant relations, the monkeys, the result, no doubt, of their less human appearance and quieter habits. Nevertheless, they are extremely interesting animals, whether from the point of view of the naturalist, or simply of the unscientific lover of pets.

Scientifically the Lemuroids are placed next in order to the monkeys and form the second sub-order of the Primates, and to quote from the very excellent guide to the Mammalia in the British Museum:—"This sub-order consists of a number of very remarkable animals of a far lower type than the monkeys; they are for the most part natives of Madagascar, although a few aberrant members of the group are found in Africa and Southern Asia. They are invariably arboreal in their habits, with generally long, bushy, and non-prehensile tails, opposable thumbs and great toes, large eyes, and long dog-like faces." They are divided into three families—the Lemuridæ, Tarsiidæ, and Cheiromyidæ, each of the two latter containing only a single species, while the first is subdivided into four groups, which contain all the remaining species known. The first and last of these families are at the present time represented at the Zoo; the first by specimens of ten or eleven species, and the last by its solitary species, the Aye-aye. The best known of the Lemuridæ are the true Lemurs, all of them inhabitants of Madagascar, of which something like twenty specimens, representing six or seven species, are now in the Gardens. It was to them that Linnæus gave the name Lemurs—lemures, ghosts, from their habits being more or less nocturnal—though it is now popularly extended to all the family. By most of the authors of the last century, to whom several species were known, they were called Macacos, or Makis, though we find many variations in the spelling—for example, Maucauco, Mocawk, and Mococo, and these by no means exhaust the list. Dr. Brookes, in his Natural History of Quadrupedes, describes seven species, while Pennant enumerates eleven; but the ringtailed lemur was the Macaco, or Maki, par excellence, of all the authors of this time, being then, as now, generally the best known of the family. Unfortunately this extremely handsome and gentle lemur is excessively delicate and difficult to keep in confinement, seldom living for any length of time, and is not at present represented at the Zoo. It is the animal which is more particularly known to sailors and dealers as the "Madagascar cat." Among the species that are represented the ruffed lemur is certainly the handsomest, as it is also the largest; indeed, it is a very handsome and striking animal, with a long, thick, black-and-white coat, and a grand bushy black tail; but it is neither so lively nor so amiable as some of its smaller relations. The black lemur is perhaps the plainest of the family—no lemur can be called ugly; this species is noticeable for having the sexes so dissimilar in appearance that until quite recently they were considered to be specifically distinct, as the male is perfectly jet black from the end of his nose to the tip of his tail, while his mate is of a dingy yellowish-red, with white whiskers. Animals of this species appear to be comparatively hardy in confinement, and several of them have lived for a considerable period in the Monkey House. So well, indeed, do they thrive that one female has brought forth no less than seven young ones since its arrival at the Gardens in the year 1882, the last of these, a male, having been born on June 10 last. And here we may mention the curious manner in which the young are carried. When first born, the helpless little creature, which is almost naked, clings to its mother's waist, attaching itself firmly by grasping her fur with all its hands, and twisting its tail tightly round her in such a position that when she sits up it is hidden by her legs, and so firmly is it fixed that it rides safely through all her leaps and bounds. As time goes on and it becomes stronger it changes its position from time to time, often riding on its mother's back, and eventually, but gradually and by slow degrees, it learns to walk alone. Besides the ruffed and black lemurs, there are now living in the Gardens specimens of the five following species—the black-headed, the white-fronted, the red-fronted, the flocked, and the mongoose lemurs—all of which are dull-coloured in comparison with those we have already mentioned. In addition to the true lemurs there are in the collection specimens of the genera Hapalemur, Cheirogaleus, and Microcebus, but of these one alone, the little grey lemur (Hapalemur griseus), is shown in a wall-cage, the others being kept in the keeper's room. This little animal, however, is one of the most interesting of the lemurs, not only for its rarity—it is but the second that has been in the possession of the Society, its predecessor having been acquired in 1883—but also for its quaint beauty and wonderfully gentle winning ways, which obtain for it a good deal of attention. Both Cheirogaleus and Microcebus are strictly nocturnal, and, therefore, of very little interest to the general public; but this remark, perhaps, hardly applies to the brown mouse lemur (Cheirogaleus milii), which the keeper regards with great pride and is fond of showing to visitors. This beautiful little animal, which is in appearance much like an enormous dormouse with very large and prominent eyes, has lived in its present quarters since the year 1878, and is still fat and well-liking. "Billy," as it is called, is perfectly tame; but from its strictly nocturnal habits is by no means lively in the daytime, though it never seems to resent being taken out of its snug nest of hay for purposes of exhibition; but, in the evening, after the Gardens are closed, it wakes up, and takes both food and exercise. Like the dormouse, this species hibernates during the cold season.

To lovers of pets, lemurs must always be of interest, as no other animals combine so many attractive qualities; in fact, in our opinion, the only drawback they possess is their excessive delicacy, which renders them extremely difficult to keep in a house; so difficult, indeed, are most of the species, and notably the most beautiful of all, the ring-tailed lemur, that even at the Zoo, where they live in an even temperature and carefully guarded from their greatest enemy, draught, they are by no means long lived. Were it not for this most unfortunate drawback they would, no doubt, be far more often kept than they are. They have all the amusing ways of the smaller monkeys without their treachery and cunning, and, though they can bite shrewdly on occasion, they are, especially if they have been captured young, usually gentle in their manners and capable of great affection; in fact, to quote an old author, they are "very sociable, gentle, harmless creatures." Their activity is most extraordinary, and they delight in taking long flying leaps, pitching with the utmost lightness, and never by any chance missing their hold; in this way they will, for example, leap on to the top of an open door, and from that on to a distant chair. When in good health they are extremely playful, at which times, as Dr. Brookes said, they "use a sort of galloping with their tails raised over their backs," pouncing about with extended arms in a peculiarly ludicrous manner. They form affections for, and are fond of playing with, not only human beings, but also other animals; for example, one which the writer had in his possession for some time was on most affectionate terms with a wire-haired fox terrier and a cat, both of which animals reciprocated its affection, and were never more happy than when playing with it or lying together curled up with it in a basket before the fire, where it would, with the greatest care, wash the dog's coat, at the same time combing out any knots in the hair with its teeth; a performance which seemed to afford the greatest possible gratification to both animals. This habit of licking and cleaning is one of the lemurs' peculiarities, as not only do they keep themselves scrupulously clean and attend to the coats of other animals with which they may be friendly, but they also show the greatest interest in the cleanliness of their human companions; as, for example, if a finger stained with ink be presented to them, they will lick it and scrape it with their teeth in a most persistent manner till the stain is removed. They are most chilly animals, and nothing delights them more than a good fire, before which they will sit by the hour together with their hands spread out to the blaze enjoying the warmth, in which position, notwithstanding their fox-like faces, they are quaintly human in appearance. On a hot summer day they will sit in the sun, spreading out their arms and hands to receive the heat in the same way. They are also very fond of being nursed. These animals make several different sounds, which to those who understand their ways are very expressive. When pleased and comfortable they purr loudly, much like a cat. They make a chattering noise when displeased or when wanting anything, and they also have a loud call-note—a rather shrill long-drawn-out coo-o-o—and, lastly, they grunt in a peculiar manner, which cannot easily be described, but which is by no means the least expressive of the sounds they make. They should be fed principally on fruit, vegetables, and sopped bread; but they have most omnivorous tastes, and, if allowed to be at liberty in the room during meal-times, will endeavour to help themselves to anything that may be on the table, and express the greatest disgust if they are prevented. The one we have mentioned was particularly fond of fish and butter; the latter especially it found perfectly irresistible. It was also very fond of tea, though it was by no means a total abstainer on principle, as it never missed a chance, if it saw one, of helping itself to either beer, wine, or spirits, though it was perfectly conscious that this was against rules and would meet with prompt punishment. This little beast, which was certainly among the most charming of its race, eventually, like most of its fellows in this country, fell a victim to the cold. All lemurs are particularly fond of anything sweet, and there is no quicker way to their affections than giving them pieces of sugar, or raisins, or—perhaps their greatest treat—lumps of "Turkish delight"; but they do not, contrary to the ideas of many visitors to the Zoo, care for nuts.

THE PUNISHMENT OF CRIME.

AN experiment is being tried at the Liverpool Court of Quarter Sessions which deserves attention. The Recorder, Mr. Hopwood, Q.C., holds and expresses in public a very strong opinion that the sentences usually given in criminal courts are much too severe. In his address to the Grand Jury at the last Quarter Sessions, he is reported in the Liverpool Daily Post of the 24th of October to have said:—"I am bound to affirm my deliberate opinion that two-thirds of the imprisonment inflicted throughout the country, whether on indictment or on summary conviction, might be abated without in the least detracting from the security of property or the safety of person." This is a very grave statement; for, if Mr. Hopwood is right, the judges of the superior courts, the Chairman of Quarter Sessions, his brother Recorders, and the magistracy generally are all wrong. In cases in which a sentence of three months' imprisonment is usually given, one only would be consistent with justice, or where a sentence of twelve months is given four would be sufficient. Mr. Hopwood confessedly acts on the principles he enunciates, with results which he thinks are beneficent, not only to criminals, but also to the public. Other authorities, including the magistrates and the heads of the police, it is believed (and not without warrant), hold them to be mischievous.

In commenting on spoken words it is, we admit, the fairest thing to set out the whole speech, for detached sentences may be,

and often are, much modified by the context; but, as this is impossible in an article like the present, we will endeavour to extract from the address above mentioned certain principles which we conceive there can be no doubt that Mr. Hopwood laid down. They are as follows:—

1. That sentences are generally too severe.
2. That a criminal should only be punished for the crime immediately under the consideration of the Court, no matter how many previous crimes he may have committed and been tried for.
3. That severity of punishment has been tried and has been found to be not efficacious.
4. That diminished severity in Liverpool has diminished crime.
5. That in sentences the temptation to which the prisoner has been subjected should be taken into consideration.

With regard to the first proposition—namely, that sentences are generally too severe, Mr. Hopwood may be right, although authority, as we have suggested, is against him. It is true that there has been a general tendency for many years towards leniency in punishments. If Mr. Hopwood can make out that a sentence of one month is sufficiently deterrent, a sentence of three months would be cruel. Upon this point we insist most strongly, that the end and object of punishment is to deter, and that reformation, however desirable it may be, is only an incident. The object is, first, to deter the offender from offending himself; and, secondly, to deter others from offending. If this can be done by sentences which are loosely called “lenient,” as well as by sentences described as “severe,” Mr. Hopwood has proved his case. But whether or not he has proved it is what we propose to consider.

With regard to the second proposition, that only the crime for which the offender is being tried should be considered in the sentence, if the object of punishment is to deter, and it is found that the punishments previously inflicted do not deter, it seems logical to increase the punishment in the hopes of its becoming deterrent. Abstention from crime is practised habitually by the majority of mankind. If a man who has made thieving a profession were absolutely certain to receive fifty lashes with a cat-o'-nine-tails immediately after a theft, he would abstain. The inconvenience on one side would outbalance the desire on the other, “the malady of not wanting”; but if this is true, and it is found by experience that previous punishments have not afforded sufficient inducement to abstain, it is surely not unreasonable to try to increase the punishment up to abstention point.

The third and fourth propositions, viz. that severity of punishment has been tried, and has been found inefficacious, and that diminished severity in Liverpool has diminished crime, may be taken together. In the first place, has severity of punishment been found inefficacious? This question is quite apart from that of the cruelty of unnecessarily severe punishments. But has it been shown by experience that severe punishments have not been efficacious to deter? The familiar instance given is the sentence of death for sheep-stealing, which was the sentence provided by law for that offence within living memory. As long as the death sentence was the penalty, sheep-stealing went on in the Western counties; after the death sentence ceased to be the penalty, the crime died out. But the fact was that the death sentence for such an offence so shocked the public conscience that juries would not convict, and the offenders had a fair prospect of getting off scot free. When juries had no longer any hesitation in convicting, and a long term of imprisonment or penal servitude was almost certain to follow, sheep-stealing became not good enough. This, we believe, to be the true explanation; uncertainty in punishment is a fruitful source of crime, and whether Mr. Hopwood's so-called system or the general practice of other criminal tribunals is right, it is little less than a scandal that on one side of the invisible line which separates the city of Liverpool from the county of Lancashire a man should be liable to three months' imprisonment for an offence for which he would get only one month on the other. As to the diminution of crime in the city of Liverpool, figures are very deceptive. It is possible, and indeed probable, that magistrates who do not approve of Mr. Hopwood's principles do not commit prisoners to the Sessions if they can help it, they either send them elsewhere or deal with them themselves; and the Report of the Chief Constable of Liverpool just issued is sadly against Mr. Hopwood's theory of a diminution of crime, for he says that, not only has there been a considerable increase in the number of robberies in the last year, but the number of habitual thieves has latterly largely increased. Indeed, the danger is that Liverpool, with all its wealth, may become a happy hunting-ground for thieves, which is a little hard on the population and also upon the police. Figures, as representing the number of persons sent for trial at the Sessions, are more than usually deceptive, as far as any deduction from them can be made as to the state of crime; but the figures represent offenders in the aggregate. If, as Mr. Hopwood suggests, his lenient sentences have diminished crime, this must have taken place by a process of reasoning by individuals. A professional thief (we will say) practising in the city must have reasoned in this way:—“I feel very much tempted to commit this theft; but the Recorder's sentences are so lenient that I will not do it.” We can fancy such a man stepping across the city boundary with a sense of freedom. “Here I am in the county, the county magistrates give penal servitude; Mr. Hopwood has never given it, although he has had 2,000 cases of crime before him; moreover, the magistrates give long sentences of imprisonment; therefore, I will commit a robbery at once.” Does any one seriously believe that severe punishments, whatever may be the other objections to them, are less deterrent than lenient ones? When Mr. Hopwood says, as he is reported to have said in the charge above referred to, that “the question of punishment has been too long treated as one of system on paper supported by theoretical anticipations [this, we suppose, is a misprint] without sufficient regard to flesh and blood, the weakness of human nature, and the overmastering temptation to which it is subject,” he is treading, in our opinion, on very dangerous ground indeed. We ought to feel, it would appear, for a poor fellow who is tempted by the sight of a splendid piece of plate or jewelry, or, if he be horsily inclined, a very fine horse, and modify our sentences according to his temptation. If this theory were carried out to its legitimate conclusions, stealing the Koh-i-noor diamond would hardly be deserving of any punishment at all—we doubt whether logically it might not be made into a meritorious transaction. Is it possible to conceive a scale of punishments which shall take into consideration flesh and blood, the weakness of human nature, and temptation? After all, who is to judge of a man's temptation? One man's temperament may make him much more liable to temptation than another's. Prisons and penal servitude were invented to assist men in making up their minds whether they should commit crimes or not, that they do give men very valuable assistance in that way is certain. We do not in the least believe in the efficacy of mild punishments as a deterrent, although, for aught we know, the general scale of punishments is too high; but that remains to be proved.

THE CLOSE OF THE RACING SEASON.

THE racing season has now come to an end, and we propose to take a short survey of the principal meetings since the last of those at Newmarket. At Liverpool Mr. J. Hammond's Garter beat ten other two-year-olds for the Knowsley Nursery, although giving every one of them weight. Roseus ran him to a head at 29 lbs., and Spring Cup ran him to half a length at 26 lbs.; but he had had to wait a long time before he got an opening, and at the distance, where he obtained a clear course for the first time, he was so far behind the leading horses that his victory seemed impossible; so, although hard fought, it was in reality rather a brilliant one. He had lately been estimated within 13 lbs. of Surefoot, and he is generally considered a level, lengthy colt, and especially well shaped behind the saddle; moreover, with three crosses of Touchstone, Birdcatcher, and Melbourne, and two of Gladiator, there is nothing wanting in respect to his breeding. It was a great compliment to Captain L. Heywood Jones's Theophilus to lay 5 to 1 on him when meeting Sir R. Jardine's Lord Lorne, the winner of the Ascot Stakes, the Ascot New Biennial, and the Drawing-Room Stakes at Goodwood, for the Bickerstaffe Stakes, even making allowance for his third in the Cambridgeshire; yet these long odds were amply justified, as he won easily by a couple of lengths. Possibly Lord Lorne was somewhat out of form; for two days later, with odds laid upon him, he was beaten by three and a half lengths, for the Liverpool St. Leger, by Mr. Abington's Freemason, whom he had himself beaten by a very similar distance when giving him almost as much weight at Ascot. Mr. Abington's handsome, and very speedy, four-year-old colt, Juggler, won the Liverpool Stewards' Cup easily under the heaviest weight in the race. He won the same stake a year ago; and all his three victories of the last two years—he has only run half a dozen times in the course of them—have been gained at Aintree.

The Liverpool Cup had excited a good deal of interest immediately after the Cambridgeshire, because the second and third in that race—Claribelle and Theophilus, who had been separated by a head—were handicapped for it with only 11b. less between them. As the handicap had been made before the Cambridgeshire was run, it reflected very great credit upon its compilers, Messrs. Topham and Mainwaring. Before the race, however, Captain L. Heywood Jones decided to run his four-year-old, Theosophist, instead of Theophilus. Strange to say, Claribelle now only finished fifth to Philomel, who had run twelfth in the Cambridgeshire, while Réve d'Or, who had run eleventh for the same race, now ran second. It is true that Claribelle was receiving 4 lbs. less from Philomel, and 6 lbs. less from Réve d'Or, than in the Cambridgeshire, but this alone was not nearly enough to account for the reversal of form. The true cause of it may have been that Claribelle failed to stay the quarter of a mile by which the Liverpool Cup course exceeds that of the Cambridgeshire in length. Theosophist ran third, and his victory on the following day in the Great Lancashire Handicap made the Liverpool Cup form of Philomel and Réve d'Or appear still better and still more surprising when considered in relation to their Cambridgeshire running. The Liverpool Cup was the first race of importance won by Colonel North, who has spent very large sums in the purchase of racing stock. His lengthy, short-legged, and wide-hipped mare, Philomel, if not exactly very graceful, is of an excellent stamp, and she is a direct descendant of Melbourne, while her dam was by the good little Lecturer, who landed a very large stake for the late Lord Hastings at a time when it was sorely needed.

At Derby, a field of twenty-three came out for the Chesterfield Nursery Handicap, which Major Egerton had made with such skill that bookmakers laid as much as 10 to 1 against the two first favourites, while thirteen horses were backed at 100 to 6, or less; yet he had allowed himself a margin of less than 2 st., and at the finish the three placed horses were all carrying within a very few pounds of the middle weight. He showed quite as much knowledge of his subject as did his critics in the betting-ring; for, although the latter were right in making Killowen the favourite, he only won by a head from Devilfish, who started at 25 to 1, while Ambassador, against whom 20 to 1 had been laid, was third, half a length off. A head behind him followed Ratton, with Roseus close to him; so it was a beautiful race, as well as a magnificent piece of handicapping, the first five horses finishing in a cluster. Killowen had been handicapped as 16 lbs. inferior to Garter before the Houghton Meeting, and as his running now with Devilfish and Ambassador, who ran second and third, pretty nearly bore out the estimate then formed of their merits in relation to himself, it is probable that Garter may still be about a stone in front of him. Like Philomel, he is a grandson of Solon, and consequently he also represents Melbourne blood, as also do both Theophilus and Theosophist, whom we have already had occasion to mention. Killowen has double-crosses of Melbourne, Emilius, and Bay Middleton in his pedigree. On the second day at Derby, Mr. Houldsworth's Ponza, who had finished in the rear-rank for the race just noticed, gave weight to all her opponents for the Doveridge Stakes of 750*l.*, and won by a length. A most unusual thing happened earlier on the same afternoon. Owing to the dense fog, the jockey who was making the running for the Foston Selling Plate got off the course, and sent his horse with a crash into some black boards, while some of the other jockeys found themselves in a lane. Two horses that had persevered fought out a pretty finish; but the stewards declared the race void, on the ground that not one of the nine starters had run the right course. Half an hour afterwards it had cleared sufficiently to allow a field of fifteen to run off the Chatsworth Handicap of 500*l.*, which was won by a 16 to 1 outsider, in Captain L. Heywood Jones's Coolshannagh, a filly by that very moderate Derby winner Sir Bevys. This, again, was an excellent handicap, the first four finishing within a length of each other, not one of them having started at less than 12 to 1. On the last day at Derby it was thought that Claribelle would make amends in the Chaddesden High Weight Handicap for her defeat for the Liverpool Cup, and she was again made first favourite, although she had to face an opposition of seventeen; but she only ran ninth, and the race was won by Mr. C. Hibbert's Parga, who was carrying the lightest weight for her age in the race and started at 12 to 1. But an even greater surprise was in store in the next race, the Osmaston Nursery Handicap of 500*l.*, for which seventeen horses ran and Prince of Tyre was a strong favourite. As much as 20 to 1 was laid against the winner, Mr. J. Glover's Oxeye, who had won four races, run second three times, and been unplaced only twice this season. This chestnut colt by the little-known stallion Oxlip, by Stratheonan, had been wonderfully cheaply bought after a Selling Race for 290 guineas. On the afternoon of Oxeye's last victory we had one of the, to our mind, highly objectionable exhibitions of two-year-olds running a two-mile course. Among the starters was San Marino, the two-year-old winner of the Feather Plate over an even longer course at Newmarket; but the favourite was Mr. T. Holmes's Dauntless, who had lately won races over a mile at Newcastle and Liverpool, and he now won, after a hard race, by three-quarters of a length from Theosophist and a length from San Marino.

At Northampton, Mr. Hammond's two-year-old filly Enamel showed herself much nearer Lord Penrhyn's Far Niente than had been generally supposed; for she had been handicapped 8 lbs. below him in October, and now at only 3 lbs. she ran a dead-heat with him, and was subsequently only beaten by a neck. On the same day, Devilfish and Rotten Row, a couple of two-year-olds that had hitherto been ranked as third or fourth class, won races from large fields, and showed so much improvement that they must be estimated higher when calculations have to be made for next season.

The Manchester Meeting was, as usual, very largely patronized by owners of racehorses, and two hundred and thirty-eight horses ran in the course of the three days. Mr. H. T. Barclay's Galway, who a week earlier had run third to Oxeye for the Osmaston Nursery at Derby, and three lengths behind Shall We Remember, now, when meeting her on 5 lbs. better terms, beat the last-named filly by half a length for the Lancaster Nursery. The best form shown in the race was that of Captain Machell's Innisheen, who gave Galway 8 lbs. and ran him to a neck; and, judging from Innisheen's subsequent running in the Eglinton Nursery, he cannot be very smart, even when due allowance is made for the weight he was then carrying. Sir Robert Jardine's neat little chestnut colt, Wise Man, who had begun the year well by winning the Lincolnshire Handicap on the third day of the racing season, ended it by winning the Lancashire Handicap on the last day of it but one, bringing up his winnings in stakes to something over 2,000*l.* Curiously enough, he had not won a single race between times. There was heavy rain on the Friday night, and the course was very heavy in consequence on the Saturday, and, although fine throughout the day, it was so misty that it was impossible to see anything of the racing more than a quarter of a mile off. There was a field of twenty-eight for the Manchester November Handicap, a race that had given rise to a great deal of betting beforehand. Mr. Abington's Lady Rosebery, the winner of last year's Liverpool Autumn Cup, was the favourite at 9 to 1; Amphion, the winner of the Jubilee Stakes and two races at Ascot, and Vasitas, the winner of the Grand Prix de Paris, came next in favouritism at 10 to 1, and then came Mercy, the hog-maned Ringmaster, Ashplant, and Fallow Chat at from 14 to 17 to 1. There was scarcely room for the large field at the start, and in the six or seven breaks-away there was a good deal of crowding and crushing. Ashplant bolted at an early stage of the proceedings, and took no further part in the contest. The old plater, Tommy Tittlemouse, made the running during the greater part of the race. On entering the straight he was beaten, and so also was Amphion, whose heavy weight told upon him in the heavy ground, in addition to which it is probable that, excellent as he is, he may not be a good stayer. The winner of the Grand Prix, who had nearly a stone less on his back, struggled on a little longer; but he was well beaten a quarter of a mile from home. Rather to the surprise of the majority of the spectators, the six-year-old Irish hurdle-racer, Conservator, a son of Arbitrator, whose stock have run very well during the last month or two, was now leading, under his light weight of 6 st. 10 lbs. Below the distance he was challenged by Mr. Vyner's Fallow Chat, who passed him easily, and won by a length and a half. Conservator finished about as far in front of Phil. The second, third, and fourth in the race had started at 33, 40, and 100 to 1, and the first, second, and third favourites did not finish among the leading ten. Goldseeker, for whom 8,000*l.* was refused after he won the City and Suburban—his last victory—pulled up lame. It should be said to the credit of Mr. Vyner that he himself not only bred Fallow Chat, who is a bay filly of a useful rather than very ornamental type, but also her sire, Hagioscope (by Speculum out of a Macaroni mare, grand-dam by Stockwell), as well as her dam, Stonechat, who was by Adventurer out of a King Tom mare. Her only other victory of the year had been in the Lincoln Autumn Handicap. She was now ridden by Luke, who has won twenty-six races in France this season, but has only had seventeen mounts altogether in England. The 7 st. 5 lbs. which she carried was rather below the middle weight of the handicap, and it cannot be said that the winners of the great handicaps during the past season, with the exception of Amphion, have done anything very extraordinary. Then the great three-year-old races have been almost monopolized by Donovan, and by far the most interesting racing of the past season has been among the two-year-olds—a fact which may well lead us to hope for excellent three-year-old racing next year.

THE MAXIM GUN.

TO give an exact description of a piece of mechanism such as the Maxim gun in an article of this nature, and without the aid of diagrams, would be a hopeless task, and we shall not endeavour to do more, therefore, than furnish a general idea of the principles on which the automatic system is based. The weapon which has attained so much notoriety of late years, made its first appearance at the Inventions Exhibition of 1884, but has since been considerably altered and improved upon. Striking and original as the invention was, it did not at first make much way towards favour, owing to the prejudice against machine-guns in the military mind, engendered to a great extent by the failure of the mitrailleuse in 1870, and the numerous cases of guns "jamming" in our recent small wars. The French mitrailleuse was as heavy as a field-piece, was very cumbersome, had only a very moderate rate of fire, and a range only equal to that of the musketry of the period. Its successors of the Gatling and Gardner types had all the same tendency to get out of order at a critical moment, and many gallant lives have been recently lost owing to their "jamming," especially with the naval brigades that have had charge of them in our battles in the Soudan. Their fire was likewise inaccurate, because of the fact that they were all fired by working a crank or lever, and the impulse given to the gun by the force that had to be applied was sufficient to divert its aim. Another cause of inaccuracy was the heating of the barrels when the fire was at all rapid.

The novelty of the Maxim system consisted in this, that the force of recoil, which was a source of trouble in other patterns, was turned to good account, and utilized for the eminently practical purpose of loading and firing the gun. The mechanism, therefore, became entirely automatic, and a force which had to be counteracted by brakes and other costly devices, was now absorbed, and set to profitable work, like a burglar in a convict prison. A wasted energy was diverted to a useful purpose, and became the principal element of success. That this is so will be apparent from the following considerations. The "jamming," which was the most fatal defect of previous patterns, occurred owing to the cartridge being damp and hanging fire, while the crank or lever was being rapidly worked. It was therefore, perhaps, partially withdrawn when in the very act of exploding, the forward end of the case was driven firmly into the chamber, and the mechanism thrown out of gear. Or, again, the crank may well, in the heat and excitement of action, be worked so rapidly that the cartridges, which fall into position in the older systems by their own weight, cannot attain their allotted position in due time. They are, therefore, crushed in the act of falling, and the gun is put out of action. This is why machine-guns have so constantly refused to act just at the supreme moment when their powers are most needed, and these are the defects Mr. Maxim has especially succeeded in overcoming. In the automatic gun, which is his invention, the first cartridge is exploded by simply pressing a button, much in the same way as one rings an electric bell. The recoil engendered by the explosion opens the breech, inserts a fresh cartridge, throws out the old one, and explodes the next round. This one in like manner causes the same movements to be automatically repeated, and "so ad infinitum," like the fleas. The cartridges are "fed" from a revolving belt, which can be quickly replaced, when emptied, by a full one. There is only one barrel, usually of a calibre suitable for a rifle, although, with slightly different arrangements, larger natures have been proposed, and are being experimented with at present. The rate of fire thus obtained with these cartridges is about six hundred rounds per minute.

It will be understood that, since the explosion of a cartridge is entirely dependent on the recoil caused by that of its predecessor, a jam owing to a "hang fire" or a "miss fire" is simply an impossibility. All that would then occur would be that the gun would cease firing, and none of the mechanism would be in the least injured or out of gear. A few seconds would be sufficient for a man to remove the cause of trouble, and the bullets would again pursue the even tenor of their way. The automatic system, however, has likewise a considerable advantage over others, in so far that no external force is brought to bear on the gun to fire it. One of the chief causes of inaccuracy in the other types is, therefore, entirely obviated, and on a perfectly rigid platform a Maxim gun, once carefully laid and set in action, should go on putting bullet after bullet into the target without any relaying or interference being required. The fact of its only having a single barrel likewise gives it an advantage in a way we have not alluded to as yet. It can be surrounded with water, and the temperature of the barrel kept down by this means. This is provided for by surrounding it with a water jacket in such a manner that the water has not only to be heated, but also evaporated. The barrel cannot, therefore, become heated beyond 212° Fahrenheit. It is found in practice that, after 600 rounds have been fired rapidly, the water in the jacket commences to boil, and that it subsequently evaporates at the rate of one and a half pints for every 1,000 rounds fired in rapid succession. After 2,000 rounds have been thus discharged it becomes necessary to replenish the water; but it is not necessary to cease firing to do so. This rapid evaporation of the water is looked upon by some as the weak point of the system; but the occasions on which it would be necessary to fire at the maximum rate from one gun for three minutes would not often occur, and it would, in any case, not be a matter of extreme difficulty to carry a few quarts of reserve water with the gun. The other natures of machine-guns become so heated after firing 1,000 rounds in rapid succession that a lower rate of speed has to be adopted; so that here the Maxim has an immense advantage as long as the water holds out. We should mention that the force of recoil likewise introduces a definite quantity of water to the jacket as each round is fired. The number of rounds per minute can be accurately regulated from two or three up to six hundred. The weight, of course, varies with the calibre, that of the 45" gun being 65 lbs., while the total weight of this piece mounted on a travelling carriage with limber and boxes, packed with nearly 4,000 rounds of ammunition, is only 11 cwt. 44 lbs. The gun can be mounted in various ways according to the uses for which it is intended, but is usually placed on a tripod stand or on a travelling two-wheeled carriage; in every case it is pivoted on a universal joint capable of motion in any direction. It stands about 3 ft. high, is 4 ft. 9 in. long, and is protected by a steel shield which is fixed on its carriage or stand and weighs 70 lbs. This would be an immense protection to the man working it, who can do so sitting low down behind it and completely covered, as far as his front is concerned, from musketry fire. The tactical application of the weapon is a point on which opinion is still a good deal at variance, because it has never been subjected to anything like a practical trial. The next big war will certainly see it in use, and a scheme of tactics will then be evolved from the experience of the campaign. Contrary to our usual custom, we have taken the field first in regard to machine-guns, and they have, in the recently-issued Infantry Drill, attained a recognized position in the organization of our forces. They are intended for use with the advanced guard, and will find congenial employment on outpost and reconnaissance duties too, where they will probably be profitably associated with the mounted infantry, an arm which we have likewise been the first to adopt. It is a remarkable and somewhat extraordinary circumstance that in the service in which it would seem that there lay the widest sphere of action for its powers, the Maxim gun is conspicuous by its absence. The navy patronize the Hotchkiss and Nordenfolt, and other systems, but not a Maxim is to be found on board their ships. Yet for use in the tops, in boats, or to repel an attack of torpedo-boats, this weapon seems especially suited, while there would here be no danger of a want of water for the jacket. The service which has most cause to regret the jamming tendencies of other patterns should try their luck next time with an arm that will not play them false in that respect, and will shoot as straight, if not straighter, than any other. With all these vaunted guns, however, there is always the difficulty of picking up the range, owing to the impossibility of seeing where your shots fall. With field-artillery itself this is a matter of great difficulty, even at ranges as short as 1,500 yards, and the help to vision in the smoke the explosion of a common shell supplies. But with small-bore machine-guns there is no indication whatever to guide us, and a stream of bullets may be flying altogether wide of the mark, and an enormous waste of ammunition taking place, without the gun-detachment being any the wiser. Range-finding has entirely to be trusted, and range-finding on service has not, as yet, shown itself altogether above suspicion.

THE ARGENTINE CRISIS.

THE Argentine Republic is passing through a severe financial and commercial crisis, which threatens to become severer still. For some years past the Republic itself, the provinces or States of which it is composed, and the municipalities have been borrowing in Europe in a most extravagant manner. Most of the loans have been raised in London; but at length the British investing public became alarmed at the haste with which debt was being piled up, and then issues were made upon the Continent, especially in Paris, Berlin, and Amsterdam. At the same time, too, to encourage the opening up of the country by means of railways, guarantees were most lavishly given by the Federal Government. New lines were projected in every direction; many of them have been built or are being constructed, and not a few run parallel to old lines, while many pass through districts as yet unsettled. Other industrial enterprises were likewise encouraged, and the result is that the number of loans raised and Companies brought out in Europe of late years has been such, as we have said, that the European public refused to subscribe any longer. At the end of September last the Statist published a list of the borrowings and Company issues from the beginning of 1882 to the date at which the article appeared. The whole amount applied for was, in round figures, 110½ millions sterling. Some of the loans, it is to be recollected, were Conversion loans, and therefore added nothing to the already existing debt. But, on the other hand, the whole of the loans brought out upon the Continent are not included, as it was found impossible to get correct information respecting the smaller of these. Several small issues in London, too, were excluded. Setting off the omissions against the conversions, it may be said that, in round figures, the Argentine Republic, the provinces, cities, and industrial Companies raised in Europe, or at least attempted to raise, about 100 millions sterling in 7½ years. This, it will be admitted, was going rather fast for a population of about four millions. But this is not all. The Buenos Ayres Standard, which is edited by a well-known statistician, published at the end of last month a table of the new Companies brought out in the Argentine Republic itself since 1882. It is evident that the list was suggested by the table published in the Statist a month previously; but it is not clear whether the Standard's figures, like those of the Statist, include the year 1882. The substance of what our Buenos Ayres contemporary tells us is that since 1882 new Companies have been issued in the Argentine Republic with capitals amounting in the aggregate to very nearly 600 millions of dollars. It will be understood that the issues at home are quite separate from and in addition to the issues in Europe. There is this further difference between them, that the issues in Europe are all gold obligations. The loans have to be paid, principal and interest, in gold, and the dividends on the shares are likewise payable in gold; but the capital raised at home is in paper. Over and above all this, the National Mortgage Bank and the Hypothecary Bank of the province of Buenos Ayres have issued Cédulas, which the Buenos Ayres Standard estimates to amount to about 500 millions of dollars at the present time. These two banks are somewhat like the Crédit Foncier of France. They lend to owners of houses and lands; but they do not lend money; they lend bonds secured by mortgage on the houses and lands, the borrower selling the bonds for the best price he can get. The bonds are called Cédulas, and they therefore represent debt incurred by the owners of houses and lands in the Argentine Republic—that is to say, in a population of about four millions of souls—and the debt is estimated by a competent authority at about 500 millions of dollars. We find, then, that in less than eight years the owners of houses and lands have incurred debts amounting in the aggregate to 500 millions of dollars, that new Companies have been floated at home with capitals amounting in the aggregate to about 600 millions of dollars, and that loans have been raised and Companies floated in Europe amounting in the aggregate to about 100 millions sterling. And all this, we repeat, has been done by a population of about four millions of souls.

While all this was going on an Act was passed to establish what was called free banking—that is to say, banks with the right of note issue on condition that they deposited gold in the Treasury. Most of the provinces founded banks under this Act, and borrowed largely in Europe in order to do so, and the banks, new and old, immediately began to issue notes in competition with one another. The issue soon became excessive, and the purchasing power of the notes of course declined. We may remark, in passing, that specie payments are suspended, and the notes, therefore, are legal tender. This excessive issue of notes, together with the still more excessive issue of Cédulas, and the great influx of foreign capital, gave rise to a speculation rarely paralleled. Prices of all kinds rose to unheard of heights. Perhaps the speculation was wildest in houses and lands. The two mortgage banks referred to above were eager to lend to any intending purchaser who applied to them, and the purchasers, finding such accommodating bankers, were not slow in making application. As an example of the recklessness that ensued, we find it stated in the Buenos Ayres Standard that in the summer of 1887 a piece of ground in the city of Buenos Ayres was offered to the Government for half a million of dollars, twelve months later it could have been bought for a million of dollars, and in the summer of this year it was purchased by the Government for five millions of dollars. In two short years the price of this plot was multiplied ten times. Probably this is an extreme case, but there is no doubt that something similar has occurred all over the Republic. Men saw the chance, in Johnson's phrase, of becoming rich beyond the dreams of avarice, and they were eager to seize it. They rushed to the mortgage banks for loans, and the loans were given without stint, and it is to be feared with very insufficient examination. Hardly less wild, however, was the speculation in securities, and more particularly in the shares of new Companies. The fact that in so small and backward a population such vast issues could have been made in seven or eight years is evidence enough of the wildness of the speculation. It is stated by our Buenos Ayres contemporary that only part of the capital of these new Companies has yet been paid. It is, however, now being called up in instalments monthly or quarterly. But the subscribers are very often unable to meet the calls. Even men reputed wealthy have been obliged to ask for delay. The result of the whole is that the value of the legal tender-notes went on constantly falling. As specie payments are suspended, gold is bought and sold like any other commodity, the price, of course, being measured in paper. When gold was quoted at a premium of about 80, the Government became alarmed, and, instead of recognizing its own mistakes, accused speculators of manipulating the gold market and endangering the credit of the country. Accordingly, it forbade what are called time bargains in gold, and when the authorities of the Stock Exchange offered some remonstrance, the Stock Exchange was closed by force, and only opened again on a promise from the authorities that time bargains would in future be prevented. The obstinacy of the Government in clinging to its mad policy, and its childishness in attributing the blame of the result to others, alarmed the public, and the premium on gold continued to rise. In other words, the value of the notes fell more rapidly than before, until at last 240 paper dollars were worth no more than 100 dollars in gold. Then at last the Government became seriously alarmed, and adopted measures which, if taken a couple of years previously, might have prevented a serious crisis, but which unfortunately were put forward too late. It stopped the issue of Cédulas by the National Mortgage Bank, it ordered the withdrawal of the notes of the National Bank, it promised to contract the note issues of other banks, and it entered into negotiations with the Government of the province of Buenos Ayres to stop the issue of notes and Cédulas in the province. It undertook itself to withdraw the notes of the National Bank, which was throwing upon the taxpayers an obligation that ought to have rested upon the shareholders. But, on the other hand, it increased the capital of the bank very largely, taking a portion of the increase itself in repayment for the withdrawal of the notes—an illusory compensation. And, lastly, it ordered the sale of a tract of country larger than all Germany.

Had the excessive issues of notes and Cédulas been prevented years ago, all would have been well; but to stop further issues now, and actually to withdraw the issues of the National Bank, exceeding 41 millions of dollars, is to threaten with ruin every speculator in the Argentine Republic, and to endanger the position even of investors. The wild speculation in land and houses, for example, was fostered by the readiness with which the two mortgage banks made advances to the owners of houses and lands. Every one who bought calculated that he would be able to sell again to some other speculator, and that the mortgage banks would go on lending as freely as ever. But if Cédula issues are stopped, the mortgage banks cannot go on lending; speculators, therefore, cannot obtain accommodation, alarm will be excited, and almost inevitably there will be a ruinous fall. Further, if the 41 millions of dollars in notes now issued by the National Bank are withdrawn, an artificial scarcity will be created in the Buenos Ayres money market. Every borrower will be called upon by lenders to repay the loans made to them, and nobody will be able to obtain accommodation from his banker. As a matter of course, there will be alarm, probably even consternation, and prices will fall, perhaps, as much in a day as they rose before in weeks or months. It is, of course, better to apply a remedy now than to let matters become even worse, and, therefore, bring on a more ruinous catastrophe. But, all the same, the application of remedies now is likely to be attended by the gravest consequences. That this is the view taken in the Argentine Republic itself is very clear, from the fact that the premium on gold, which was about 140 per cent. when first the Government recognized the magnitude of the errors it had committed, fell to about 100 per cent. when remedial measures were promised, but has been rising again very rapidly. At the end of last week it was as high as 132 per cent., and, though there has been a slight decline since, the probability appears to be that before very long it will be higher than it ever hitherto has been. All this means that, while a little while ago 240 paper dollars were worth no more than 100 dollars in gold, the public regained confidence when remedial measures were promised to the extent that 200 paper dollars exchanged for 100 gold dollars. But now that the remedial measures have been made known, and time has been given to consider them, the value of paper has again fallen alarmingly, so that at the end of last week 232 paper dollars were worth not more than 100 dollars in gold. Of course everything possible is being done to persuade the public that there is no cause for panic, that the Government has very large funds in the Treasury, that its credit abroad is excellent, that in the immense tracts of unsettled lands it owns it has reserves to draw upon far beyond its needs, and that the large immigration from Europe is reinforcing the population so rapidly, is so extending the area of cultivation, and is increasing wealth so fast, that, if the people will but have confidence in themselves and in their country, all will go right. Of course, too, the great financial houses all over Europe that have brought out loans and Companies in such numbers of late, and that have thereby committed themselves so deeply, are supporting the market; but it is difficult to see, nevertheless, how a catastrophe can be avoided. The crisis may be prolonged, but it will be strange indeed if, on that very account, it does not become more and more acute.

PICTURES OF EGYPT.

IT was a bold act on the part of Mr. Frederick Goodall, R.A., to collect his work of thirty years in the exhibition which is now on view at Messrs. Graves's galleries in Pall Mall East. A few years ago Mr. Goodall might have anticipated a more popular success than he has any right to expect now, since his methods are old-fashioned and his style constrained within academic limits. We confess, however, to being pleasantly surprised by the general effect of these fifty examples of Egyptian painting, executed between 1859 and 1889. We did not think, if we may misquote Macbeth without flippancy, that there was so much tone in the old man. When we have seen these pictures hanging singly on the walls of the Royal Academy, we have been apt to be struck rather by their bright thinness, by their tendency to garishness, than by their harmony. But doubtless the kindly element of time has done much for them; at all events, when they hang side by side in no alien company, they are rather pleasant to look at.

When Mr. Goodall was bringing home, thirty years ago, his Eastern studies, and was exhibiting these and his more elaborate Oriental compositions, they were looked forward to eagerly, and were hailed with delight; they were a novelty, if not a revelation. But Egypt was much less known then than it is now. The incidents of life among an obscure people are always attractive to us, and we suspect that it was the incidents more than the execution of the paintings that interested the British public; to whom were welcome the unusual Eastern sunsets, and of course the constantly recurring Mother and Infant theme, the babe in this case held on the shoulder or in the palm of the hand. But Mr. Goodall's work fails today to raise much enthusiasm in the breast of the spectator, who sees on every hand more minute, realistic, and animated portraiture of Oriental life and effects. We confess, for our own part, to preferring Mr. Goodall's studies to his more elaborate compositions; for instance, (20) and (23), of men swathed in voluminous draperies, standing in groups talking together in the sunset light, are very effective, while the majority of the larger compositions are undoubtedly laboured and wanting in conviction. Of the several heads of pipe-bearers, camel-drivers, and singing girls, the dull faces, devoid of all alertness and animation, are the reverse of stimulating; but then facial expression is understood to be not a strong point of Oriental ambition.

Of the larger pictures of incident, "The Sheikh's Daughter sowing the Dhowrah Seed" (35) into holes formed in a ragged-looking strip of ground, while her handmaidens hasten after her to pour water into each hole from an earthen ewer, is interesting. Another large canvas, "Dwellers in Tents" (3), is positively charming; the group of a woman standing with her hand outstretched towards two goats is effective and good, where the effect of the whole is very harmonious, with its suffusion of brown tone over the tint and its accessories. Of the numerous "Evening Prayers," that of the Bedouin (40) is reposeful and pleasant with its twilight sky. But Mr. Goodall's "Pets of the Harem," lately seen at the Royal Academy, looks sadly thin and garish in execution and in colour. Perhaps if this subject had been treated on a smaller scale, it might have been more successful, and the unfortunate suggestion of a Venus—absent—would not have been so palpable.

We need not, however, dwell at ungracious length on the imperfections of pictures the greater part of which are exhibited solely by the courtesy of their owners, among whom his Grace the Duke of Westminster is the principal.

THE RED HUSSAR.

RECENT English authors and composers have displayed very little capacity for the production of good comic opera. The work of Mr. Gilbert and Sir Arthur Sullivan is a thing apart. The dramatist has humour and imagination, the composer never falls below a high artistic standard of merit, which rivals and imitators rarely approach; and their operas are governed by an intelligence peculiar to themselves. When their characters do anything, it is with a comprehensible motive, fantastic or quaint as the motive may be; there is none of the meaningless "business" which the average stage-manager devises because he feels that characters and choristers must not stand still and do nothing. A certain level of passable mediocrity is often reached away from the Savoy, and The Red Hussar is a case in point. Mr. H. Pottinger Stephens has strung together familiar stage incidents, which are evolved by the aid of familiar stage characters. There are verses which rhyme and scan, but are devoid of fancy, feeling, or wit; there is dialogue to match, though the hearer may perhaps smile at rare intervals if he is easily amused. Mr. Edward Solomon has composed some thirty numbers, of which about three have a shade of distinctive ability, the rest being the journeyman labour of a musician who knows his profession and could doubtless write year after year for an indefinite period half a dozen or more such scores to order. The parts are filled by vocalists who have studied singing and are accustomed to the stage, for which, however, they display no particular aptitude, and they are aided by a low comedian whose object is not to develop comic character, but to pick up and repeat such jokes as he can find. It has never been our custom to eulogize everything on the French stage to the depreciation of our own theatre; on the contrary, we are convinced that plays are often better acted in London than in Paris—sometimes an adaptation is more artistically interpreted in one of our own theatres than the original was in Paris; but where comic opera is concerned it is different. We have not a Judic, a Chaumont, a Granier, a Dupuis, and the opéra-bouffe tenor of the Mario-Widmer type, who very often indeed had no voice, and yet rendered the music very pleasantly, is unknown on our boards. Light comic opera is essentially a French product. Their librettists, if not by any means all Meilhacs and Halévy's at the best, usually contrive to invent character and incident; the music, slight as it may be, seldom lacks a joyousness and appropriateness that is absent in the writing of our own composers, and there is an art in the performance of these trifles of which our singing actors and actresses are ignorant. Take the average French success, such a piece as the Giroflé-Girofla of M. Lecoq—how infinitely superior it is in all respects, humour, wit, imagination, character, incident, novelty, melody, musical significance, to the very best of our own manufacturers of regulation comic opera can produce!

Mr. Stephens, having nothing new to say, says it at great length. The "Red Hussar" is one of the many maidens known to fact and fiction who have followed their lovers to the wars, the wars in question being those campaigns in which, according to Uncle Toby, our armies swore terribly. Kitty Carroll's lover is a ruined spendthrift named Ralph Rodney, who is cast off and captured by Barbara Bellasys, according to her varying beliefs as to his pecuniary prospects. He has a rival, Sir Harry Leighton, who also goes to Flanders, and causes Ralph to be arrested for deserting his post, as he does at Kitty's request; she, in her ignorance of martial law—in spite of her exploits in a red uniform, with high-heeled boots and gilt spurs, such as never hussar nor other horse soldier could or would have worn—having written to beg him to come. This is practically the whole of the story; for it will, of course, be understood that Kitty, who ultimately proves heiress to the fortune which Ralph had for a time held, is married to the man of her choice. The flirtation of Corporal Bundy and Mrs. Maghee, a military Little Buttercup, and the aimless philanderings of an amorous Colonel, fill up intervals which struck us as being very unnecessarily protracted. Of the music the best number is a tenor song, "Guide of the Night," an aria in F, common time, which would be much more meritorious were it not so direct an imitation of the French school. Gounod, Massenet, Délibes, Adam, Bizet, and others have written similar melodies, and scored them in similar fashion; and, if the song had been signed by Mr. Goring Thomas, it would have been recognized as not uncharacteristic work. Let it be admitted, however, that it is a good example of its genre. The great proportion of the score is sadly barren, however. We look thankfully at a neighbouring exit, grateful to see that we can escape if the business grows wearisome beyond endurance, as we hear Mr. Hayden Coffin grinding out bars of insignificant crotchets and quavers, and trying to persuade himself and us that they are melodies, or as we listen to the not too rich or accurate intonation of Miss Marie Tempest following Mr. Solomon's unsuccessful researches after and attempts at a new air in three-four time. The "Song of the Regiment" has spirit and swing, and the approval which we notice has been bestowed on the little duet, "The Maiden and the Cavalier," is deserved. Effect is here gained by simple means, and the chorus of soldiers, "Tramp! Tramp!" is also lively. In order to hear what is bright and pretty, one has to sit out much that is dull and cruelly commonplace. Mr. Ben Davies, as Ralph, sings well enough to induce us to overlook his somewhat ponderous acting. As a rule the players have small chance of distinguishing themselves; but then if chances were provided it is far from certain that they would be accepted.

MONEY MATTERS.

AS the end of the year approaches uncertainty in the money market increases. Most of the joint-stock banks make up their accounts on the last day of December, and for a little while previously they do not lend as freely as at other times. On the contrary, some of them require loans already made to be repaid, for they desire to show a large amount of money in hand and at the Bank of England, so as to give the impression that they habitually hold more cash than they really do. Commercial firms also like to have large balances with their bankers at the end of the year, and immense sums have to be accumulated to pay interest and dividends due at the beginning of January. There is, therefore, a smaller supply in the short loan market, and a stronger demand than usual, and consequently there is more or less of pressure every year towards the end of December. This year it is feared that the pressure may be exceptional. The causes which tend to make money scarce in London operate in every great banking city of the world, and money is exceedingly dear already in many cities, more particularly in Berlin, New York, and Buenos Ayres. For a little while past small amounts of gold have been going from London to Berlin; and if the Berlin money market should become seriously stringent, the amounts taken may be greatly increased. A demand for gold for New York is also possible; while a demand for Buenos Ayres is sure to make itself felt before long. The causes of the crisis in the Argentine Republic are explained elsewhere; and it is pointed out that the Government is withdrawing the notes of the National Bank, has ordered the contraction of the circulation of the other banks, and has pledged itself to accumulate a large gold reserve. All this clearly cannot be done without taking gold from Europe. There must be sales by the Government of something which it now possesses in order to obtain gold, or a loan must be raised. It is possible that the demand may be put off till next year; but it is also possible that the crisis may become so acute in Buenos Ayres that gold may have to be taken at any cost. Still, though all prudent people are taking precautions, the money market has remained easy throughout the week. The rate of discount has been only about 4 per cent., and at the settlement on the Stock Exchange which ended on Thursday evening borrowers were able to obtain all they required at rates ranging from $4\frac{3}{4}$ to $5\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., though in some few cases $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. was charged.

While the money markets of Europe and America are thus tight, there is unusual ease in the Indian money market. Trade in India is exceedingly good, the exports are of unusual magnitude, and the imports are also large. There is likewise general activity in the interior, yet the discount rate of the Bank of Bengal is only 5 per cent., while that of the Bank of Bombay is as low as 3 per cent. At this time last year the rates were in both cities 7 per cent., rising rapidly to 12 per cent. in February. Still there is a good Indian demand for silver, although the Indian banks are not willing to pay more than 44*d.* an oz. Early in the week the price advanced to 44 $\frac{3}{8}$ d. per oz. But as the Indian banks were unwilling to give as much, and as the Mint ceased buying, there was a decline to 44 $\frac{3}{16}$ d. Operators evidently are waiting for President Harrison's Message next week. It is known that an attempt will be made to carry through Congress a Bill doubling the present coinage of silver in the United States. And it is believed that both in the House of Representatives and in the Senate there are majorities sufficient to carry the measure. It is doubted whether President Harrison approves or disapproves of the Bill, and the market is waiting for some expression of opinion by him to gather whether he will veto the Bill if it is passed. If the Message is favourable, there will probably be a sharp rise.

The uncertainty of the money market and the Brazilian revolution have taken the courage out of speculators. All departments of the Stock Exchange, therefore, have been inactive this week. Other circumstances have combined to impose quiet. There are fears of a great coal strike at home which would paralyse all trade and tell most injuriously upon the earnings of the railway Companies. Miners are not unanimous; but there is evidently a strong party in favour of a strike, and the fear that there may be one tends to depress railway stocks. Then the International Department is affected by the Liquidation in Berlin, which ends to-day. Apparently, it will pass over without serious difficulties; but operators have had to pay very heavy rates for the accommodation they obtained, and they are little in a position to engage in new risks. The Brazilian revolution, too, has further discredited the leaders of the Paris market. The revelations of the Comptoir d'Escompte failure were little calculated to inspire the French investing public with confidence in Paris bankers, and now within a few weeks after the issue of the National Bank of Brazil by a group of powerful bankers there comes the revolution in Brazil. The public, therefore, refuses to follow its former leaders, and speculation is for the time being paralysed in Paris. Still, there was a sharp rise on Thursday in Egyptian Unified Bonds, it being believed in Paris, notwithstanding semi-official contradiction, that the Government has now given its consent to the conversion of the Egyptian Preference Debt. In New York the money market is very stringent, and is likely to become more so before the end of the year, while a judgment of the Supreme Court of Illinois has disorganized the market for Trusts. Trusts, as they are called, have been in much favour lately in the United States. The Gas Trust in Chicago was a combination of four Companies to obtain a monopoly, and the Court has decided that its operations are illegal. There was a fall in consequence of about twelve dollars in the shares of the Trust, and of course, if the ruling is good, other Trusts, at least in Illinois, are in no better case. In Buenos Ayres the Government is endeavouring to restore confidence by asserting that it has immense assets, that it will contract the circulation, and will accumulate a vast gold reserve. It is reported that on Thursday the premium on gold declined to 114½ per cent.; but, as fluctuations in the premium are incessant, this will probably be followed by another rise. However, there has been a recovery in Cédulas dealt in on the London market. There has likewise been some recovery in Brazilian securities, the news from Rio being all favourable. But it will be long before confidence revives.

The trade improvement continues most satisfactorily at home, and is spreading upon the Continent, and, indeed, all over the world. The prices of produce, therefore, are all tending upwards. It is true that iron fell this week about 5s. a ton, and recovered only about a shilling. But this is a mere fluctuation in the upward movement. Speculation has been very active of late, and the speculators who bought cheaply have been selling with a handsome profit. The price of silk has risen in about six months fully 25 per cent., and the market is very firm. Coffee, too, is rising. The price in Java has been advanced, and, naturally, the Brazilian revolution tends to strengthen the market. Brazil is a great coffee producer, and if there should be disturbances the conveyance of the crops to the ports might be interrupted. The copper market, too, is steadily advancing. The consumption has increased very much since the failure of the Comptoir d'Escompte, and the production was checked by the fall of prices that took place early in the year. Now a great fire has broken out in one of the American mines, which is likely to diminish the supply still more. The prices of copper-mining Companies, therefore, have all advanced.

HUMANITY TO THE RESCUE!

["The National Vigilance Association further asserted the right of women confined in lock-ups to be dealt with by Matrons of their own sex."—Daily Paper.]

THE jesting world, too ready with its sneer
Of cheap derision for your works and ways,
At last grows serious; and in shamed amaze
Crying, What hideous scandal have we here?
Before you, O Association! lays
The offering of its penitence sincere.

Alas, for wrongs unheeded, nay unknown!
Alas, that, after ages come and gone,
The light of Vigilance but now has shone
On wretched women into lock-ups thrown,
And vainly pleading to be waited on
By matrons of the female sex alone!

Ah! monstrous fruit and melancholy sign
Of long injustice and the vassal state
Of voteless woman! We, who legislate,
To no such outrages ourselves resign.
The men who on our male offenders wait
Are all, without exception, masculine.

Nay, 'tis no theme for laughter; 'tis a tale
For blushes rather, if in times like these
So pure, so civilized, so—what you please—
The matron of a nineteenth-century gaol
Employed in such peculiar services
Should often be—or should be ever—male.

Nor let the shallow critic, keen of eye
For words alone, and miserably blind
To vital truth within the word enshrined,
Pretend the bull of Ireland to descry,
Deride the wrong, and in false ease of mind
Its very possibility deny.

For though the vulgar hold his saying true,
The Vigilants know better: inward aid
From self-examination has conveyed
This truth to them, that Nature, with the view
Of varying her programme, has not made Matrons of one sex only, but of two.

REVIEWS.

FANNY BURNEY AND HER FRIENDS.*

ALMOST before reading his book we were disposed to give Mr. Seeley a "fistful of hand." Considerable as has been for years the taste for the eighteenth century, Mme. d'Arblay has scarcely had her full share of it. A new edition of Evelina was published, it is true, a few years ago, and we think Cecilia followed. But the nineteenth century has, on the whole, refused to follow the laudable example of Mr. Delville, and "receive Cecilia"; while even her earlier, and to our thinking much more agreeable, sister has been rather cavalierly treated. The Branghtons (they are so forgotten that people actually print them Braughton) and Mr. Smith are infinitely amusing, and even Mme. Duval "makes spread the spleen," and Captain Mirvan, though an intolerable brute, is, we greatly fear, by no means a very gross caricature of the service which made us a great nation at the time that it was at its best. But to the creator or copyist of Miss Branghton and Mr. Smith the capable critic shall refuse no admiration at his disposal; and we hereby promise that, if any lady-novelist will during a reasonable time produce even one character half as good as either of these two, we will give her leave to write sixteen bad novels off the reel without a murmur from the Saturday Review. Even Miss Burney's admirers have usually treated her cavalierly. It has never been very clear to us whether Macaulay really liked her, or merely availed himself of her harmless little body as a weapon wherewith to deal swashing blows at Croker and at Courtiers and at people who do not consider the late Mr. Charles James Fox the ideal of all that constitutes a gentleman, a statesman, and a proper moral man. Even in his treatment of Bacon he hardly daubed on the antitheses more crudely than in this famous and certainly delightful essay. Thackeray, of course, was far more in sympathy with her, but he had more occasion to borrow than to praise. Elsewhere laudatur (and not so very much of that) et alget.

Mr. Seeley has devoted himself much more to the Memoirs than to the novels, and has indulged in but little strictly literary criticism. He has, however, we think, made a very good point in reference to the curious inequality between the best parts of the novels, and still more the Diary, and the worst. He has pointed out that at the time when Evelina, and to some extent Cecilia, were written, Fanny was what they would call in France surexaltée, by mixing at once in abundant society and in very literary society, and that this stimulus was wanting to her later work. We are not sure that he has pointed out, but it is, at any rate, a legitimate part of his argument, that the so-called hardships of her Court sojourn were exactly suited to stir up her observing, if not her creating, faculty afresh. He has argued very well that she really possessed little strictly literary taste or interest in books, and that the despised family of Windsor, the butts of the skits of the young gentlemen of Brooks's, and of kind Dr. Wolcot and of clever Mr. Macaulay, in reality knew much more about English literature, and took much more interest in English literature, than the author of Evelina. What he has not fully accounted for, and what no man has accounted for, is the tremendous badness of her later style. One can only say that she remembered nothing but Johnson and her father, and only the worst features in their case.

Fanny Burney is very far from being the only example of this forcing or manuring effect of society and circumstances. The Single-speech Hamiltons of both sexes are a great deal more numerous than is commonly supposed. Where she had quite unusual luck was in the character and combination of those circumstances. She was practically the first woman in England to adopt a style of writing peculiarly suitable to women's talent, and she had no immediate rivals, and none for a very long time of any importance, except Miss Edgeworth. She may be said to have unconsciously anticipated a taste of which the public itself was unconscious, the taste for the novel pure and simple, the novel of observation and conversation, almost of tittle-tattle. The immense consumption of such novels during the past century (Evelina was published 111 years ago) proves that Fanny had unawares struck on just such an idea as those which have made the fortune of many scores of millionaires. Unluckily for her, "copyright in ideas" being unobtainable, she could only secure a few thousand guineas on her own exemplifications of the notion, instead of, like the happy patentees of self-acting minders and of Turkey Red, quietly hauling in the money on other people's use of them. Like other epoch-making books, Evelina may be regarded as in one sense the end, as well as in another the beginning, of a school. But, like them, it is much more a beginning than an end. Contrast it with its immediate predecessors, the work of Richardson, of Fielding, of Smollett, of the French school of sensibility, and its literary inferiority to all (for Fanny never was a good writer, and all the schooling of Johnson and Crisp could not make her one) is not more marked than the presence of something which is in none of them. Immeasurably as Fielding stands above Frances Burney as a student and painter of human nature, he is not her equal in the little trivial thumbnail sketches of individuals which constitute the charm of Evelina and Cecilia. If we may adopt a fanciful comparison, there is the same difference between them as there was to the Divine ear between the devotions of Theocrite and those of the Angel in Mr. Browning's poem. And, to take another point of view, though Miss Austen is nearly as far above Mme. d'Arblay as Fielding is, it is at least possible that we should never have had the Meryton circle and Mrs. Norris and the Prices (Fanny could not set her any example of Mr. Collins or of Mrs. Elton) if it had not been for the forerunner whom Jane so diligently studied. For, though Miss Burney tried sensibility and romance often enough, her real forte lay in absolute realism, slightly, but only very slightly, satiric. Where Smollett and Sterne aimed at bravura and caricature, where Fielding and Richardson, each in his different way, aimed at, and succeeded in, realizing great literary types of character, real enough, at least in Fielding's case, but also more than real—nature turned into great art—Miss Burney gives us the natural men and women with the art—but also with the minimum of the art—necessary to make them acceptable. And it is for this very reason that her Diaries, at least during her best period (for her interests as wife and mother seem to have quite choked her literature) are so much better than all but the very best part of her novels. The equerries and the princesses, her guests at Streatham, and the mad King at Kew, are as much alive as the Branghtons and Mr. Smith—they could not be more so.

Mr. Seeley, as we have said, pays comparatively little attention to the novels. He weaves his narrative out of extracts from the Diary and letters, with connecting comment, and he has succeeded in making a really interesting book of it. Parts, indeed, are well known even to those who do not know the original work by their transfusion into Macaulay's matchless, if also rather sophisticated, summaries, by the excerpts in Thackeray's Four Georges, by selections of this and of that kind in one place or another. The recesses at Streatham, the Royal visit to Oxford, the arrival of the King and Queen at Mrs. Delany's, the rage of Cumberland at Miss Burney's success, the last days of Johnson, the visits of this first of lady-reporters to Warren Hastings's trial, the odiousness of Mme. Schwellenberg, the faithlessness of Colonel Digby—a score, or rather a hundred, of other things rank among our best memoir pieces, among the passages that we can set best against the death of Vatel and the heroic conduct of the Mr. Whiffers of Les Rochers, who resigned when asked to make hay, against the capture of Orleans by Mademoiselle and Mme. de Rémusat's interviews with Napoleon. Mr. Seeley might perhaps have illustrated more freely from contemporary literature. His note on Fanny's reference to the Probationary Odes is a little vague, and does not of itself show much acquaintance with that graceless but very amusing book (observe the frankness with which we admit that the Whig dogs can sometimes have the best of it). Mrs. Schwellenberg certainly invites illustrations from Peter Pindar, "savage" as even Macaulay allows him to be. But, on the whole, Mr. Seeley makes a good and useful fight against the notion (to which Macaulay lent the whole of his vast influence) that Miss Burney's Royal master and mistress not only overlooked and underpaid her, but deprived English literature of immortal works by employing her to hand caps and mix snuff. To begin with, half-pay for life after five years' service is not absolutely stingy treatment. In the second place, though some of the duties of the place were irksome, and Mrs. Schwellenberg an old German she-bear, it is by no means so clear that Frances could have done much better for herself. In the third, when she was set free, she showed anything but extraordinary eagerness to resume novel-work, and accomplished anything but first-rate work in the kind when she did resume it. In the fourth, even if the postponement of Camilla for some years seems an intolerable evil (it will seem so to very few), there remains the question whether we could possibly have got out of Miss Burney as a novelist anything better than we have got from her as a diarist. In that capacity we owe her, as all competent authorities are agreed, one of the very best pictures of a decorous kind of a Court "in intimacy" that exists—probably by far the best of such pictures. The Prince who would and could not "keep sober for Mary," the surreptitious banquet enjoyed by great ladies and waiting-women alike behind the ample gowns of the dons who had provided it in Christ Church Hall (thought as much to be associated with that building as its "line of light" from the opposite heights), the inimitable panic when the King and Queen dropped on the quiet household which their homely kindness had not only endowed but furnished with everything down to "sweetmeats and pickles"—these and other figures and scenes rank among the best of their kind. They could not have been better if they had not been true, or if Queen Charlotte had not wounded Macaulay in the most sensitive part of authors, from Martial to Mr. —, by trying to avoid buying new copies of books.

NOVELS.*

IF a study of mental disease makes a legitimate basis for a novel, the author of A Conspiracy of Silence has achieved success. But to many minds such a subject is repulsive, to others it may be at once attractive and unwholesome. But, if it is to be treated at all, it ought to be treated with practical knowledge and literary skill; and both qualifications are present in this very clever and very painful book. The power which the writer possesses has been intensified by artistic self-restraint. We are neither shocked with a multitude of morbid horrors nor bored with the crudities of a note-book realist. The plot is simple; the characters are few and distinct; the motives are intelligible; the catastrophe is inevitable. Charlotte March is a bright and healthy girl, who falls in love with a rich and attractive young man, the chosen friend of her more prosaic cousin, a hard-working barrister who writes for the newspapers. She supports herself and her mother by teaching, and she is naturally glad to give up drudgery when Eustace Sotheran returns her affection and offers to make her his wife. Everything is going quite smoothly, although the reader suspects from the first that there is something more than eccentricity in her lover's extravagant gaieties. Before the wedding takes place it becomes clear that he is doomed to develop in his own mind the malady of his ancestors—clear to the mother, who conceals her knowledge; clear to the cousin, who is baulked in trying to reveal his discovery; clear to the unhappy man himself, who fights against his self-condemnation, first honourably and afterwards deceitfully; clear to everybody but the destined bride. That is "the conspiracy of silence" to which she becomes a victim. The blow does not fall at once, being for a time suspended by the painful struggles of the afflicted man, first to avert and afterwards to conceal his lunacy. The most powerful chapter in the book is where the young wife beginning to be anxious surprises her husband's awful secret, realizes what sort of a life lies before them both, and sees that he is too mad to be at large and not mad enough to be placed under control. Feeling an insurmountable physical repugnance towards her husband's disease, and indignant at the fraud practised upon her, she doubts her own power to carry out obligations which never ought to have been imposed upon her; and she is particularly bitter against the barrister cousin, in whom she had trusted, and whom she unjustly believes to have been a party to the "conspiracy of silence." It is to her mother, deceived (so she thinks) along with herself, that she turns for comfort, and the good lady does not enlighten her. With an admirable philosophy the mother takes a good share of the daughter's material prosperity, and shuts her eyes to the mental wretchedness by which it has been purchased. Indeed, she finds complete consolation for a trouble which does not affect herself by bragging, in a lady-like way, about the grand country-house which she visits as an honoured mother-in-law and the fine county-folks with whom she associates on terms of equality. Up to this point it has been fair enough to disclose the plot because, even without our judicious revelation, it would have been clear to the least experienced readers of novels. Those who are tempted by the taste which we have given them must go to the book itself if they wish to trace the further developments of an unhappy marriage, and to discover whether the filial illusion is maintained to the end, whether a kind irony permits the daughter to keep her faith in the mother who had betrayed her, and whether the barrister cousin (who is, of course, a lover) continues to bear the reproach for a disaster which he had done his best to avert. With all his goodness he is not quite so attractive as he ought to be; there is no complexity in his character. He is always certain to do what is right; an admirable quality in real life, but in a novel not interesting. Even the heroine gets our sympathy more from the trials to which she is exposed than from regard for herself. The real interest of the book lies in the two conspirators, the mother and the husband; being neither good nor bad, they introduce the element of uncertainty. We never quite know what they will do next; when they have done it, whatever it is, we begin to see that they could not have done anything else. That is high praise to the author; but the author deserves high praise—except in the choice of subject. Not the smallest merit of the book is that the two persons who work all the mischief are not in the least odious. The mother who is bent upon her daughter making a good match would pass in the world for "quite a dear old lady," and her conscience evidently gives her no trouble. The young lover, on the other hand, who conceals the affliction which should have prevented him from becoming a husband, is fully conscious all the time that he is behaving in a dishonourable way; but in his disordered mind we see that passion is too strong for the sense of duty, and we pity him even in his selfishness.

Difficult to read and difficult to appraise, Gobi or Shamo is as full of cleverness as an egg is full of meat. Written by the most youthful of Greek Professors, it describes the adventures of three young men, two scholars and a bore, who start on a journey through the unexplored regions of the Chinese Empire in search of a distant Ionic colony, founded by some of the captives of Darius, who made their escape into "the great desert of Gobi or Shamo," and there built a town for themselves, where their descendants are still preserving the old civilization in a land of barbarians. Their existence was accidentally revealed to one Mavrones, an ardent young scholar engaged in the collation of MSS., who found and deciphered some writing on the parchment cover of one of his codices. He determined to visit the overlooked colony of Greeks, partly from curiosity, and partly because he was distressed that the founders had gone away from Greece too soon to have known anything about Plato. He persuades another enthusiast to go with him, and another companion (the bore) forces himself on the expedition. One thing should be noted; the MS. which Mavrones found had apparently been read by some scholar before him, since there was a blot upon one of the letters. Well, to pass over their adventures on the way, which were sufficiently interesting, they succeeded in their object; having got a passport through the Chinese Empire (a matter of some little difficulty), they did at last arrive under the walls of the Greek city; but they were not permitted to enter it. The inhabitants, who had jealously preserved the purity of their blood as well as the traditions of their literature and politics, did not permit any foreigner to pass their gates. True, they had made an exception, but that was by inadvertence. A stranger whom they mistook for a Greek, because he was evidently not a Tartar, had been admitted. But when a rising took place in the tribe that dwelt outside their walls, they suppressed it, and put the district under the command of this stranger who was neither Greek nor Tartar—Algernon the Briton, as they called him. When our travellers made his acquaintance, it very soon appeared that he was none other than the scholar who had forestalled them in reading the MS., the careless fellow who had blotted the theta, and who had started right away to anticipate their discovery. His name was Algernon Trench, or (more academically) Trench of Balliol, and of course they fraternized with him at once, and had a good time. Up to this point the book is easy to read, although we do not seem to have reached an understanding with the author. Is he going to give us an elaborate skit? or are we to be thrilled with uncouth adventures? Mr. Murray seems to have wavered in his mind. He had an excellent opportunity for contrasting modern anomalies with ancient lucidities, and in a dialogue between his European tourists and the elders of his Asiatic Greeks he does make a few good points, and contrives to air his own opinions (not particularly well considered, and not specially well expressed) upon some of the social and political questions which agitate the bosoms and elicit the platitudes of mechanics-institute-young-men—such as the injuriousness of the Liquor Traffic, the silliness of Bloating Armaments, and the naughtiness of Cruelty to Animals. But Mr. Murray soon becomes weary of imitating Plato, and turns to Mr. Rider Haggard as his model. We are plunged into a savage revolution against the beneficent, but somewhat arbitrary, rule of Trench of Balliol, the Philosopher King, who fought harder for his crown than the King Philosopher of Brazil. The revolution over, we are asked to follow the perils and hairbreadth escapes of the scholars on their return to Europe via the Indian frontier. Frankly, we do not think that Mr. Murray is quite successful either in his invention or in his narrative. His tales are quite as bold as Mr. Rider Haggard's, but he lacks the cool plausibility which is the first and last essential in the art of lying with a circumstance. Where he is most successful is where he seems to have taken least pains—that is to say, in the characters which lie outside the main action of his story. Best of all is Mozep Kiarsk, the vain, good-natured braggart and bagman, who combines a superstitious credulity with a keen eye for the main chance. His sister, the beautiful Clearista, is an impostor and enthusiast of a different type. Ashamed of her Tartar origin, she pretends to Greek blood, gives herself out for a leading spirit in "the patriotic movement," and even goes so far as to deny her relationship to her brother. She is receiving the attentions of an English nobleman on his travels, and explaining that Mozep must keep her secret for a time. "Don't be angry with me," said Mozep; "if you were really likely to marry this Lordos, I would gladly wait a month or more, but I can't help . . ." She sprang from her chair:—"Mozep, you are too stupid this evening. I could at this moment ring for the Lordos and tell him to make me an offer. I have only to . . ." "Then," said Mozep, "why, by the glory of God, don't you ring for him?" Unfortunately her heart is given to the young scholar who is going away from her to find a distant settlement of that race of which she pretends to be a member. We are sorry that we do not see more of her, her brother, and her Lordos. In their characters and fortunes there was the material for a pleasant novel. But Mr. Murray has had other views, and he has so far succeeded that he has produced a book which deserves to be read for the sake of its undeniable cleverness. Evidently he could write a novel of sentiment; perhaps he could write a tale of wild adventures; perhaps, again, he could write an elaborate skit. To combine all three was to court a failure.

Men flirts and girl coquettes are advised to mend their ways. Reprehensible their conduct has always been known to be. But it is now proved to be physically dangerous. That is the lesson expounded in Another Such Victory. Victory, indeed! The book is a record of bodily retributions inflicted upon sentimental misbehaviours. Does a maid trifle with a man's devotion? He at once becomes sick unto death through misery, and she takes to her bed from remorse. Does a man offend against his wife's affection? She promptly goes off her head, and he begins to pine away in anguish. Summing up the casualties attributed to misplaced or misused love in Another Such Victory, we arrive at the following sick-list:—

EDMUND (heartbroken, because Angel had married Harry).

ANGEL (off her head, because Harry had proved unworthy of her).

HARRY (pining away, because Angel wouldn't let him explain).

CHARLIE (heartbroken, because Flossie laughed at his love).

FLOSSIE (nearly off her head, because she is so sorry for Charlie).

These sad events are, so far as we can gather, contemporaneous; and the stern author does not stand any nonsense. She does not permit her invalids to go mooning about. They are ill, and they have to behave accordingly. She fairly sends her characters to their beds. But for the stern lesson which it is her mission to insist upon, these three volumes of juvenile affection and puerile misunderstanding would be pleasant enough. Twaddling? Not quite. Vapid? Yes, they are that. But they will be tolerable to anybody who can endure the ordinary gossip of ordinary folks. They seldom fall below that level, and they can be recommended for the bedside. Open the book anywhere, read a dozen pages, and you will exchange the most persistent insomnia for a deep and refreshing slumber.

For One and the World is the story of an unconventional household. The mistress of it is a servant promoted by marriage, and made the guardian of a sickly lad with great expectations. In order to prolong her own importance she is anxious to keep him alive, but in order to retain unquestioned control of his money she tries to stunt his intelligence, and always speaks of him as little better than an idiot. She has been imprudent enough to engage as his attendant a young lady from Russia, a qualified M.D. (Paris), beautiful, enthusiastic, tender-hearted, who has no sympathy with any plots which are not Nihilistic. Between the two women there is a sharp tussle for influence over the boy patient. The lady M.D. finds her way to his heart by teaching him Euclid and algebra; the scheming trustee encourages him to make toffee with the cook and romp with a pretty maid. Sad to say, he takes an equal delight in the lower and higher pleasures. There is no telling which influence would have triumphed in the end had each been allowed to have fair play. But the lower pleasures are handicapped when the scheming trustee goes away for a honeymoon with a young architect, on whom she had cast the eye of middle-aged amorousness, and whom she had made all her own by lending him money which he could not otherwise repay. Here the plot thickens, and we begin to revel in the Unexpected. The incidents are adroitly fitted in, and we are not disposed to quarrel with the few impossibilities, legal and moral, which find their way into an amusing story. Any work of Miss Betham-Edwards is sure to contain many smart passages, and the characters talk like books—too much like books. The fault of the story is that the writer has not set herself either to copy life as it is or to imagine it as it might be. Except the lady-doctor and the boy-patient (and, perhaps, the pretty maid in whose company he takes delight), all the characters are extreme travesties of impossible types. They are so widely different from what they are intended to be that we do not believe in their existence while we are reading about their doings. A man-cook may be very genteel indeed; but even when he is masquerading as a guest at a foreign table-d'hôte he does not lay himself out to defend mother-wit against book-learning. If he did he would not talk like this:—"We have all heard what the blind say of scenery. Talk to the non-seeing of lakes, mountains, and rivers. They imagine sights far more splendid than their luckier fellows gape at with their eyes open." It is a fitting sequel to this kind of talk that, without any inquiry as to his means or antecedents, the gifted chef should become the husband of a lady of rank and fortune. Even less conceivable are the terms upon which the mistress, who was a servant herself, is supposed to associate with her own servants. First, she entertains them at table as her equals, and a few minutes afterwards she will be giving them orders about their work. In real life there is no mistress so anxious to "keep servants in their places" as one who has herself risen from the kitchen. If Miss Betham-Edwards had intended to draw a topsy-turvy state of things she ought to have taken much greater license. She might then have produced an amusing satire. By combining the probable and commonplace with the wildly impossible, by mixing human beings with abstract types, she has spoiled a rather clever book and committed the capital fault of puzzling her readers.

FENCING.*

THE volume on fencing and other arts of self-defence in the "Badminton" series has been long expected. The somewhat elaborate co-operation which has been employed, and very well employed, in producing it may be more or less accountable for the time that has elapsed since it was first announced. We propose to deal at present only with that part of it which treats of fencing. It is many years since any serious and comprehensive work on the use of the small-sword has been published in England; it would be hardly too rash to say that it is a century since any English work on fencing has been published with adequate illustrations. Captain Chapman's Foil Practice and Notes and Observations, admirable so far as they go, do not form an elementary treatise, but are rather in the nature of a companion for instructors, and at the same time a manual of reference for fairly practised fencers. Moreover, these little books are a generation old, though it is well known to fencers that the author's hand has not forgotten its cunning; and we believe they are not easy to come by. The precepts to be found in encyclopædias, books of "manly exercises," and the other miscellanea of British sports and pastimes, are mostly too meagre to be intelligible except by those who already know as much as the writer has to tell them; and the substance of them, so far as it has any value, is for the most part ultimately traceable to Roland's treatise of 1809. Not that Roland's book was at all a bad one in its day; but, although the weapon is the same as it was then, the art of handling it has made considerable progress in eighty years. The late Mr. Maclaren's attempt to improve on the French school is memorable only as having led Captain Chapman to affirm the doctrine of the French masters by way of protest.

The French school of fencing teaches the use of the three-edged French duelling-sword (épée de combat), which for purposes of instruction and exercise is generally represented by the foil, not only a cheaper and handier instrument, but in some ways more elegant. The flat-bladed two-edged rapier was supplanted by the small-sword early in the eighteenth century in France and England. In Italy, however, the flat blade survives, and in Italy, now as much as in the seventeenth century, the weapon of instruction and practice differs from the fighting weapon only in being made harmless. It answers to the French épée boutonnée, not to the foil. Strictly speaking, therefore, there is no such thing as a foil in the Italian school. The grip of the sword, and consequently the muscular mechanism of sword-play, if we may be allowed the expression, are quite different. The Italian works from the shoulder, with an immovable hand-hold, where the Frenchman works with the fingers. An English reader who meets with occasional mention of the differences between French and Italian fencing—as he may in the present book, for example—must bear these things in mind if he will not be misled. It is not a matter of using the same instrument with differences of detail in execution, but of using different instruments and with distinct methods, though for similar purposes and with more or less similar general ideas. There are not many persons either in France or in England who know enough of both schools to be qualified to pronounce a comparative opinion upon them. Of those few persons Mr. Egerton Castle, one of the present joint authors, is one; but his bibliographical contribution has, of course, not given him any opportunity in this kind. As for an English school of fencing, there has never been one; and, if there is ever to be one, it can only come of much more and better acquaintance with the French school—and, if that can be added, the Italian also—than is yet to be met with. British fencing has for two centuries consisted in the following, with greater or less diligence and success, of the French model; and the only hopeful course at this day is frankly to confess ourselves the scholars of the French in this matter, and profit by their best authorities.

Accordingly Mr. Walter Pollock and Mr. Grove have not allowed any false national pride to stand in the way, but have arranged with M. Camille Prevost to offer to the English reader an authorized version of his Théorie pratique de l'escrime, one of the latest French works on the subject, and second to none for lucidity and general utility. Mr. Grove has written an introduction which will excellently serve its purpose of giving the general public some notion of the width and variety of interest attached to the noble science of arms. He does not pretend to be exhaustive. The modern Italian school is not even mentioned, and perhaps not quite enough historical allowance is made for the difference of conditions between the seventeenth and the nineteenth century. When a gentleman carried a sword as a real weapon of defence, and might have to oppose it in deadly earnest to one or more unknown adversaries, who might or might not be similarly armed, and might or might not observe the courtesies of the duello, there were things to be considered which are justly regarded as irrelevant in the modern fencing-room. But these minute points are collateral. No one can read Mr. Grove's thirty-four pages without learning that fencing has a history and a literature of no mean rank, and that it is a living art which has never ceased to make advances. With regard to the dogmatic portion of the book, which is in substance M. Prevost's, we must call attention, in the first place, to the admirable illustrations. They do not belong to M. Camille Prevost's published work, but are advance impressions from a new work forthcoming in Paris, of which he is joint author, and of which, we may say in passing, we are curious to know more. Any one who desires authentic ocular information as to the correct positions of modern fencing has only to consult this series of plates. They will not give him, indeed, the animation of the assault, or the rhythmic grace of a well-executed salute. But they will enable him to study at leisure, and with all possible exactness, the types on which all the varied movements of the fencer are constructed. As to the text, M. Camille Prevost has for several years been among the acknowledged masters of Paris, and adds to mastery of his art the power of expressing himself clearly. If we are to single out a point in which he shows the superiority of the modern school at its best, it is the careful attention paid to the management of the fingers. We think M. Prevost's book is the first which has done full justice to the importance of doigté.

There are one or two points in M. Prevost's system on which he differs from the majority of French teachers. Such are the formation of the parry of septime and the preference of tierce to sixte. These things can, perhaps, not be adequately discussed except foil in hand, and it might be enough to say that M. Prevost, whether in the majority or not, is fully entitled to his opinion. But the question between tierce and sixte leads to one reflection. This is wholly a manual of foil-play. Nothing is said of the use of the sword as distinguished from the foil. Now tierce (the parry in the high line to the right or outside with the nails down) is preferred to sixte (the same with the nails up) because it gives, as is said, a stronger position, and is really not less quick. We venture to submit a distinction. Are we speaking of the foil? Then we admit that the difference of speed may be neglected; but the difference of strength is also not worth considering. Are we speaking of the sword? Then we would ask the judicious fencer to take a duelling sword in his hand, and go through some half-dozen combinations of the circular parries, alternating tierce and its counter with sixte and its counter. If our experience is normal, he will find that there is a certain drag about the rotation of the pommel in tierce which is absent in sixte. On the whole, we should counsel a fencer to learn both tierce and sixte, and prefer the one or the other as it suits his hand best; and the same, for like reasons, as regards seconde and octave. By sixte we mean to imply that the hand is in complete supination, the thumb outside and not uppermost. There are some who take this latter neutral position and call it sixte: a practice for which we have nothing to say. The wider question of "Le jeu de l'épée" is not raised here. For our own part, we fail to see any difference between sword-play and careful and cautious foil-play. At the same time fencing, regarded as a pastime, may fairly indulge in a certain amount of experiments which would be dangerous in a duel. As a rule, fencers do not think very much of the first hit in an assault; but a duel is an assault in which the first hit is apt to be decisive. We have to add that the instructions for the salute—a grace which should never be wanting at a public assault—are given according to the revised form lately issued by the Académie d'Armes in Paris.

Mr. Egerton Castle's bibliography is an enlarged and revised edition of that which he published in 1884 in Schools and Masters of Fence. We believe it to be the most complete account of the literature of sword-play, or rather of l'arme blanche, which has hitherto been published in England or elsewhere. To comment on it would be to enter on infinite fencing gossip, and we must unwillingly forbear. As a specimen of Mr. Castle's work, however, we may call attention to the minute account of the three states in which Vincentio Saviolo's book, the earliest fencing-book known to have been composed in England, occurs. Those who are happy enough to possess it should be grateful to Mr. Castle. Only two remarks of a critical kind occur to us. We quite agree that the chronological arrangement under languages was the best for a bibliography of this kind; but an alphabetical index of authors' names would be a profitable addition. And we think the titles of the few modern Greek works on the subject might have been allowed to appear in Greek type. Mr. Castle probably transliterated them in strict obedience to the general rules of cataloguing which he followed; but we do not see the necessity in a special work of this kind for carrying obedience to that point.

Mr. Dunn's handbook, a much shorter and less luxurious one, is still a creditable product of the Inns of Court School of Arms. Mr. Willink's illustrations are somewhat roughly reproduced, but are both spirited and correct. Here, too, M. Prevost's book has been drawn upon, though only in a general way of consultation. We think Mr. Dunn's manner a little too argumentative for an elementary work, and he hardly makes enough of the paramount importance of doing the simple things well. Thus we cannot agree with him that the coup droit is not of general utility. And the suggestion of trying prime coupé "as a forlorn hope" is, we presume, ironical. The fencer who tries it against a superior adversary is like to be much more forlorn afterwards. Mr. Dunn, however, writes like a practical fencer who has really worked and thought out his subject, and those who procure the Badminton book, or already possess one or more of the modern French treatises, will none the less find his essay (for it is an essay rather than a book of set instructions) a welcome and useful addition. We need hardly add that neither book pretends to teach fencing without a master.

THE BIRDS OF OXFORDSHIRE.*

OF late years the chronicles of local British ornithology have become very numerous. One by one, every county in England is beginning to boast of a volume entirely dedicated to the history of its birds. The latest addition is Oxfordshire, which now rejoices in a handsome volume, written by Mr. Aplin and printed at the Clarendon Press. If we supposed that it would in the least degree damp the ardour of any local naturalist, we would not express a doubt which occurs to us as we take up one and another of these county histories of birds, and ask ourselves what is the positive use of them. Last year it was a volume on the Birds of Wiltshire which we had to welcome; and we ask ourselves in what essential respects the fauna of these two counties differ. The marine counties of England have manifest claims to individual consideration. A History of the Birds of Cornwall must be a totally different thing from a History of the Birds of Northumberland. There is obviously room for separate bird-books on Lancashire and Kent and Caithness. We gave a very warm welcome this year to a volume mainly dedicated to the Birds of the Outer Hebrides. But why Oxfordshire? This is a central county, with no natural boundary except the Thames—a county in a high state of cultivation, without mountains, lakes, moors, or forests. Its hills, ponds, commons, and spinneys have no special characteristics of their own. On the west the open hills are mere spurs of the Cotswold Hills, which we must journey on into Gloucestershire to study. On the east those “deep plains of Otmoor,” of which Camden writes, melt imperceptibly into Buckinghamshire. The soft woodlands of the north are not to be distinguished from their neighbouring parishes of Warwickshire. Even the great river which forms the southern frontier of Oxfordshire confounds the zoology of the county; since who is to decide whether a bird shot in the reaches of the Thames is an Oxfordshire or a Berkshire bird? This is a question which even the Scholar-Gipsy would not be able to determine.

The arbitrary limits of our counties, however, will never fail to give a legitimate stimulus to local naturalists like Mr. Aplin in the collection of local facts and instances. His book is excellently edited, and forms a veritable addition to our knowledge of his county. A careful introduction forms an interesting essay on the natural history of the county, and the volume is further enriched by a good map. This latter is, however, somewhat overstocked with names; and the writers of such books as the present would serve their readers best if they would, in the course of making their volume, jot down on a blank map those names, and those names only, which they mention in the course of their narrative. Mr. Aplin tells us that one of the most interesting spots in the county, from an ornithological point of view, is Clattercote Reservoir. After a vast deal of search on his crowded map, we have discovered, at the extreme north of the county, a nameless object drawn like a pond, and not very far from it a hamlet called Clattercot (sic). No doubt this is the sheet of water in question; but, on a map inserted specially to illustrate a book on the birds of Oxfordshire, a place to which incessant reference is made in the text might have been marked more certainly and more prominently.

Mr. Aplin does full justice to his precursors, who have not been numerous. Camden says that “Oxfordshire abounds with all sorts of game, both for hunting and hawking”; but no one went into particulars until Robert Plot, that scientific don of Magdalen, in the chapter “Of Brutes,” in his Natural History of Oxfordshire, made a few notes in 1677. It is Plot who has recorded that Osney Abbey owes its foundation to a “company of Pyes” which haunted a certain tree in the meadows there, and were “alwaies so clamorous” when the wife of Baron Robert D'Oyly passed their tree, that she consulted with Radulphus, Canon of St. Frideswide's, as to what the chattering of magpies might portend. That earnest son of the Church saw his opportunity and recommended the lady, without delay, to erect some church or monastery upon the spot so indicated. It is perhaps more interesting to find Dr. Plot stating plainly that the hoopoe bred in Oxfordshire in his day. It seems that even then this beautiful and harmless bird was the object of superstitious fear. Dr. Plot tells us that the country people believe that it never appears save—like the Sea Devil, whatever that may be—to announce an approaching calamity. A curious incident recorded by Plot is the killing of a cormorant in 1675 on the steeple of St. Mary's, in Oxford, where it had alighted after what must have been a long flight, since the sea at its nearest point, at Portishead, is about fifty miles distant. Dr. Plot was so careful an observer—though he did not know the nuthatch when he heard it—that the paucity of his notes is a misfortune. He formed a collection of birds in his college, “all of them collected in this shire.”

It was more than a century later before any fresh Oxfordshire ornithologist appeared. About a hundred years ago, Dr. Lamb, of Newbury, began a manuscript list of the birds of this county and of Berkshire, which was forwarded for publication to the Linnean Society about 1814, but was long lost or mislaid. In 1880 it saw the light at last, under the imperfect title of Ornithologia Bercheria. In 1849–50 the Revs. Andrew and Henry Matthews issued their Birds of Oxfordshire and its Neighbourhood, in which they included two hundred and thirty-two species, nine of which Mr. Aplin rules out of court, as resting their claim to inclusion on Berkshire or Buckinghamshire specimens. Since then Mr. C. M. Prior, Mr. W. Warde Fowler, and Lord Lilford have done good work in the observation of local Oxfordshire birds. Mr. Aplin claims for Oxfordshire slightly over three hundred distinct species. One or two of these may, however, be considered dubious, the evidence for the marsh warbler, though considerable, being very slight, and that for the hairy woodpecker (Dendrocopus villosus) being abandoned by Mr. Aplin himself.

Among the curious and rare birds claimed by Oxfordshire is the eagle owl (Bubo ignavus), one specimen of which was shot in 1833, and another distinctly seen close to Goring in 1843, by the Rev. A. Matthews. Three golden orioles have been shot in the county, including a pair in full plumage killed in a wood at Great Tew in 1880, apparently while in the act, with grasses in their bills, of building their pendant nests with intent to settle in our inhospitable and murderous country. The bearded reedling (Panurus biarmicus), at one time not wholly uncommon, has been exterminated for half a century; but the Bohemian waxwing is still occasionally seen. A solitary specimen of Richard's pipit has been captured in Oxfordshire, and another of the roller. In one instance, that of the Andalusian hemipode (Turnix sylvatica), Oxfordshire has added a species to the English fauna. The hemipode is a quail, without a back toe; the specimen referred to was shot by a gamekeeper at Cornwell, near Chipping Norton, in 1884. It is a bird that haunts the shores of the Mediterranean; according to Yarrell, it is very local in its distribution, and no wanderer. How this solitary specimen found its way to Chipping Norton will probably never be discovered. The red-necked phalarope has occurred once and the black-winged stilt twice in this county. It is curious to note how large a number of the essentially marine birds are claimed by Mr. Aplin for a district so remote as Oxfordshire from the sea. No less than seven of the terns are found here, the common tern (Sterna fluviatilis) being quite frequent on the Thames and the Cherwell in May, these flocks returning sometimes in September. The Arctic tern, and the record is a unique one, was found breeding at Otmoor in 1834. An equal number of gulls—seven species—are claimed for the county, many of the specimens secured being, no doubt, shot in the act of taking a short cut across England, from the Wash to the Bristol Channel. The same is true of the skuns, petrels, guillemots, and auks, which so oddly swell the tale of Oxfordshire birds.

Mr. Aplin gives an interesting account of Clattercote Reservoir, which we have already mentioned, a remote sheet of water, some twenty acres in extent, on the Warwickshire frontier of the county:—

Surrounded on three sides by thick hedgerows, and well furnished with rushes, flags, and other water-plants at the sides and upper end, it forms an attractive resort for ducks and other waterfowl. The following water-birds have reared their young there in recent years—namely, Wild-duck, Teal, Coot, Moorhen, Great Crested Grebe, and Little Grebe; the Kingfisher and Water Rail inhabit the pool, but have not been detected breeding there, while the Peewit, Reed Bunting, Sedge, and some other species of Warblers have their nests in the surrounding undergrowth, or in the immediate vicinity. I have also observed the Reed Warbler, but it is scarce. At the close of summer the waterfowl with their young throng the water, and mingle with others which visit the pool at that season, especially if the water is low. An extract from my journal relating to the 3rd and 4th of August will give some idea of the bird life to be seen at that season. The water was very low, and, at the upper end, mud flats extended far beyond the reed-beds; little streams trickled through the mud, and some deeper parts formed pools, while the growth of water-plants produced little wet islands. On the mud were nine or ten Herons, in every possible attitude. Three Green Sandpipers fed along the edge of the water, and at a little distance a couple of Common Sandpipers, while numbers of Moorhens, both adult and immature, were dotted about over the mud; every now and then one of the latter would take fright and scuttle into the reeds. The shallow water was occupied by numerous Coots of all ages, from the adults to the young not yet out of down; out in the deeper water were a few Wild-ducks and one or two Crested Grebes, and four small ducks, evidently Teal, rose from some part of the water and flew past, on a boy showing himself from one of the fields at the Claydon corner. This, of course, roused all the fowl, and sent the Herons off in a body; the latter, after flying round for some time, uttering loud croaks, perched on the tops of some neighbouring trees. A Kingfisher perched on the old wooden piles out in the water, and they were occupied later by a sandpiper.

Later on in the season this sequestered pool is the haunt of other visitors—pochards and golden eyes, snipes and tufted ducks, wagtails and pipits. Another spot famous for water-fowl is Port Meadow, lying along the banks of the river north-west of the city.

The changes which have taken place in the avifauna of Oxfordshire are worthy of notice. Mr. Aplin notes the almost total disappearance of the kite, buzzard, harrier, raven, and bittern. The latter has slowly vanished as the swamps on and around Otmoor have been drained. The snipe and the red-shank no longer breed within the county. A very curious and unaccountable change has taken place in the distribution of the nightingale, at one time as common throughout the shire as it now is in Nuneham Park and in the college gardens of Oxford. Five-and-twenty years ago the nightingales began to desert the northern portions of the county, and now it is hardly ever met with north of Woodstock. As in other parts of England, the quail is growing more scarce; but the goldfinch, which had become extremely rare, is now, as we are glad to learn, “steadily increasing again, and at the present time is fairly numerous.” Among birds which are becoming more abundant Mr. Aplin mentions the hawfinch, the ringdove, and the starling; and he is plainly of opinion that the Wildfowl Preservation Act of 1876 and the Wild Birds Protection Acts of 1880 and 1881 have been of genuine service in preventing the extinction of species. Throughout his interesting record, too, we are glad to note that naturalists are beginning to shoot rare birds less ruthlessly and to observe them more lovingly. In time, if this sort of thing goes on, the orioles and hoopoes may forgive us, and may return to breed amongst us in peace.

MR. COTTAM'S CHARTS OF THE CONSTELLATIONS.*

STAR-GAZING is not astronomy, but it makes an excellent introduction to it. Indeed, we privately entertain the perhaps presumptuous opinion that the majority of professional astronomers might with advantage be somewhat more of stargazers than they are. A man, to be sure, who, while he spends his life in taking transits to the tenth of a second, would yet be puzzled to point out with the naked eye the great square of Pegasus, and has never had the curiosity to direct a telescope upon the Orion nebula; who consults the Nautical Almanac instead of the face of the sky, and is far more interested in the rate of his clock than in the construction of the heavens, may be an excellent observing-machine, but is scarcely to be called an astronomer. His chronograph, indeed, records about as intelligently as he makes his observations. He, and others like him, of the "honest, jog-trot kind, who, had they been bred cobblers, would all their lives have only mended shoes, but never made them," are the especial products of an age of divided labour and perfect mechanical appliances. In the good old times, when it seemed as badly worth while to split a second as a hair, and the "imponderables" had scarcely begun to be broken in to the service of man, they were less plentiful. It was said of Olbers, who did invaluable work out of a garret-window at Bremen, and had probably never in his life noted the transit of a star across a set of wires, that he could always tell, by the mere configuration of the stars in the field of a telescope, the spot of the sky it was pointed towards. His case was unique; but the want of some degree of personal intimacy with the objects of research saps the vitality of many an astronomical career.

Mr. Cottam's admirable maps of the constellations are designed expressly for the use of amateurs; but every astronomer might profitably (we do not say possibly) devote a couple of years to scanning the heavens with their aid. To say nothing of the profound delights of such an apprenticeship, it would be of essential use in quickening thought; and thought is progress. Without it giant telescopes, spectroscopes, photometers, and heliometers are so much lumber, and might as well be blown at once to that "windy sea of land" where Milton's fiend "walked up and down alone, bent on his prey."

The maps before us are drawn on a scale—one-third of an inch to a degree—unprecedentedly large in modern works of the kind. They are thirty-six in number, and each includes at least one complete asterism, Hydra—an especially ill-conditioned one—alone proving recalcitrant to this advantageous arrangement. Originally projected as auxiliaries to the fifth edition of Webb's Celestial Objects (1881), and to Mr. Chambers's edition of Admiral Smyth's Celestial Cycle (1881), they include, besides naked-eye stars, the whole of the "celestial curiosities"—double, variable, and red stars, clusters, and nebulae—described in those works. Their scope was, however, enlarged in the course of execution by the addition of all the 2,775 double stars in Lord Crawford's summary of the Dorpat Catalogue; of Otto Struve's 650; and of 360 out of Burnham's thousand pairs. The projection employed is, moreover, of so simple a character that observers can readily lay down supplementary objects, thus converting the maps into a graphical working list of a handy and suggestive kind—of the only kind, indeed, available for the possessors of telescopes mounted on tripod or altazimuth stands. Yet they need not regret being precluded from the orthodox method of pointing by the setting of circles if they gain, with the expertness in the visual performance of the operation, which the persevering use of Mr. Cottam's charts can hardly fail to confer, a familiar acquaintance with the minuter features of the heavens, joined with the deep-seated and reverential wonder inseparable from their thoughtful contemplation.

A genuine reform of the constellations is hardly any longer to be looked for. The decree by which, on the banks of the Euphrates some four thousand odd years ago, the starry vault was turned into a menagerie, has proved irreversible. We may, however, be permitted to express some ineffectual regret at the disproportionate representation of the serpent tribe in the zoological collection. This class of animals combine every quality of objectionableness to astronomers. They are the least compact of vertebrates. They drag their slow length, in catalogues, through hour after hour of right ascension. Their folds and windings in the sky defy the aggregating faculty of the imagination. Each is separately troublesome; and there are many of them. But these are vain repinings. Cuius dolori remedium est patientia. Let us turn to something more practical.

Stellar nomenclature is becoming every day more alarmingly intricate. One system superposes itself upon another, synonyms multiply, identification already in many cases demands an expert. We cannot, it is true, afford to part with the old picturesque Greek and Arabic star names, which still linger on in our textbooks. Sirius and Arcturus, Vega and Altair have traditional and poetical associations which cannot be transferred to the first letter of the Greek alphabet. But we do revolt against the gratuitous puzzles provided by interlacing and intercrossing schemes of lettering and numeration. A double star in the Swan is famous as "61 Cygni." Not far off is a very similar couple, known as "6 Cygni." But the numbers in each case are without mutual significance or relation. One is Flamsteed's, the other Bode's. Flamsteed's "6 Cygni" is the beautifully-tinted pair, Albireo. Again, a single letter is frequently made to do duty for several—in one instance as many as ten—adjacent stars, which are then formed into a subordinate little series, numbered in order of right ascension. The components of a binary star are often similarly discriminated, only in order of magnitude. Thus, α^2 Centauri is the less bright, δ^2 Tauri the more easterly, of two connected stars. Anomalies of this kind abound.

The case of variables is perhaps the most immediately intolerable. That something must be done to remedy it is nowhere denied, but vague unanimity of opinion is well known to be compatible with practical inertia. The infelicitous device is due to Argelander of discriminating stars fluctuating in light from others in the same constellation by appropriating to them the Roman capitals from R onward (the earlier letters having been mostly used up otherwise). But, apart from attendant ambiguities, which we need not here stop to explain, the framework thus supplied was far too narrow for the requirements of advancing discovery. Already in two asterisms the overflow has begun, and superfluous variables are getting named by the crude expedient of doubling the significant letters, as RR Cygni, RR Virginus, and so on. We shall probably get to tripling them in a few more years.

The various systems of catalogue-numbers by which double stars and nebulae are designated have at least shaken off constellational trammels. They are frankly technical. It is nevertheless to be regretted that the reduction of the nebulae into a uniform numerical series in Dr. Dreyer's "New General Catalogue" is still largely ignored in current astronomical literature, and we question Mr. Cottam's discretion on the one point of the prominence given in his maps to Sir William Herschel's numbers and classes. They have long since been virtually superseded; they are, with very few exceptions, unfamiliar even to deeply-read students; they correspond to no natural arrangement, and, except for purposes of literary reference, were better suppressed.

Mr. Cottam was probably wise in refraining from any attempt to delineate the Milky Way. It is not a telescopic object, and the telescopic workers, for whose interests he has catered, can sufficiently distinguish for themselves galactic from non-galactic fields. To appreciate the labour of depicting, in all its delicate details, the majestic arch of accumulated suns by which our situation in space is surrounded, one should examine Dr. Boeddicker's splendid drawings of it, now on view at Burlington House. They are in many respects a completely new disclosure. Features barely suspected before come out in them as evident and persistent; every previous representation appears by comparison structureless. There is something of organic regularity in the manner of divergence of innumerable branches from a knotted and gnarled trunk; nor can the protrusion of cloudy feelers towards outlying nebulae and clusters be regarded as purposeless; while the fidelity with which the milky effulgence coils and sweeps along the lines laid down by the stars emblazoned upon it is perplexing, if it be not significant. It is simply amazing that such a work should have been executed in such a climate as that of Parsonstown.

THREE SCHOOL HISTORIES.*

OF making of school histories there is no end. We wonder whether people think that it is easy to write a good history for young learners; so many try their hands at it that it must seem a simple matter. In reality, it is nothing of the kind. In the first place, the author ought to be far more conversant with his subject than is necessary merely to ensure accuracy; he should know his original authorities, or his book will lack freshness and vigour, which is, perhaps, the chief failing in Mr. Webb's respectable volume. Moreover, he should have the art of putting things in striking, though not exaggerated, language. This implies an amount of literary skill which is not often visible in school-books; and, though we feel that its absence in Mr. Symes's Companion to School Histories injures his work, we are not inclined to judge his little essays harshly on that account. Lastly—for it is not our intention to discuss all things necessary to a perfect book of the kind—it is, of course, absurd to write a history for young people which all right-minded boys and girls must necessarily loathe, and out of which they will probably remember nothing. Such a book, however, has been written by Mr. Ropes. It is possible that he did not intend it for young people; but that makes no difference, for it is equally unsuited to persons of all ages. He gives what he calls a "Sketch"—a skeleton would be a more appropriate description, for his book is full of dry bones—of the history of Europe, from the foundation of the Roman Empire to the present day, in two hundred pages. An attempt of this sort can only be successful when it is made by an historian of first-rate ability. Professor Freeman, in his General Sketch of European History, has shown how far it is possible by skilful arrangement, by adopting broad lines of treatment, and by making facts subordinate to the general character of the period to which they belong, to handle this vast subject satisfactorily in a small space. Mr. Ropes has tried the same experiment in a considerably smaller number of pages, and, as far as we can see, without any qualifications for the task except accuracy—with which, after a pretty careful examination of his book, we believe that he may be credited—and the power of stating an enormous number of facts in wonderfully few words. We give a quotation from his "Sketch" as the best means of informing our readers as to the kind of book it is:—

After Rudolf's death there was a war between Adolf of Nassau and Albert of Austria, son of Rudolf, who overthrew and slew Adolf in battle, but was himself afterwards murdered. Henry VII. of Luxemburg was a good and able ruler, but was unable to restore the Imperial power in Italy. His death there gave rise to another civil war between Louis of Bavaria and Frederick of Austria, the House of Austria now always trying to secure the Empire. Frederick was defeated and taken at Mühldorf; but Louis now quarrelled with Pope John XXII., who lived at Avignon, and was a warm partisan of France.

And so on. The later part of his work is decidedly the best; Louis XIV., Maria Theresa, Frederick the Great, and the first Napoleon, fill such large places that it is easy to group the leading facts of European history during their times, and he has accordingly been able to present us with a somewhat more coherent narrative than he seems to have found possible when dealing with earlier periods. Still his book, as a whole, is absolutely unreadable.

Mr. Webb's History of England is carefully compiled, and is a better book than most of its class. He has divided it into chapters of convenient length and has given plenty of marginal notes of contents. His sentences are often awkward, and sometimes have too many relative pronouns, but his meaning is always plain, and he writes without affectation. Considering how important it is to make history pleasant to young readers, we think that it is a pity that he has not oftener quoted the very words which one or another famous person used on some critical occasion. As it is, his narrative is rather flat. The pre-Norman period is cut very short; no account is given of the constitutional or social condition of the kingdom before the Conquest, and it is certainly odd to find such a term as the "Witan" used in a school-book without any explanation of its meaning. As a rule, constitutional matters are treated rather feebly throughout the volume. Stories known to be false and foolish, like that about Becket's mother, should not be inserted in a book in which they must necessarily crowd out something more worth telling, and, if repeated, should be described as mere legends. Mr. Webb, we may observe, should not have spoken as though Becket's parentage was a matter of doubt. Here and there other amendments might be made; he should not, for example, call John Cabot a Venetian "by origin," or say that the clergy acknowledged the King as supreme head, without making any mention of the qualifying clause which they appended to that title, or assert that after the death of Pitt George III. was compelled to receive Fox as Minister, "much against his will"; for the King assented readily to Grenville's proposal to consult Fox on the formation of a ministry,— "I thought so, and meant it so," he replied. Mr. Webb is evidently far better acquainted with the history of the last two centuries and a half than with earlier times. There is, however, little to complain of in his book as a whole; though certainly not an ideal School History of England, it may be used with advantage. Mr. Symes believes that it is impossible to write a history of England for young people which will give due prominence to the "most interesting and important movements in the national development," and has, therefore, published a volume of short essays on these matters to be read along with narrative histories. His subjects are well chosen, and he has treated most of them very fairly. At the same time we do not think that his essays are likely to interest young readers; they are not particularly well put together, and seem to us to be deficient in method, point, style, and originality. Like a good many other writers of small historical books nowadays, he is extremely weak upon early history. His assertion that when the tribes of Angle and Saxon invaders formed themselves into nations the corollary became a "sort of serf," and that it is doubtful whether in England he was ever a free man, is utterly erroneous. In his essay on "Feudal England" he says, "Military tenure generally involved the obligation of following the lord for forty days in the year. Thus [why thus?] in case of war the King summoned his tenants; and these summoned those who held land from them on military tenure; and thus a national militia was got together." The difference between the national militia and a feudal force, which was "got together" by "these summoning those" and so on, is an elementary matter. Among his essays on later periods, the two on the Reformation are perhaps the poorest, and that on the early part of the reign of George III. the best.

THE DISEASES OF PLANTS.*

THIS is scarcely the kind of book we should expect to find in a series entitled "The Romance of Science," a term that implies that popular treatment of a subject which is especially designed to attract and instruct young people. Professor Marshall Ward's little volume will indeed be found extremely interesting to the average young person with a good microscope, and the young botanist who would investigate the physiology of plants; but those who will best profit by this excellent and lucid exposition of the more common diseases caused by parasitic fungi are students at agricultural colleges, whose education embraces that comprehensive course of scientific study the want of which has, in the opinion of many good judges, proved a serious disability to British farmers in the past. Mr. Ward treats of smut, rust, and ergot in cereals; of "club-root," the "damping-off" of seedlings, the "mildew" of vines and hops, the potato disease, the curious disease that results in "bladder plums," and the lily "rot," which attacks the buds and leaves of L. auratum and its allied species. Of these diseases the two last are at present by no means general through the country, though familiar to most growers of fruits and flowers. Rust in wheat has in recent years, as Mr. Ward says, been "rigorously kept in check now that botanists have explained the nature of the disease," and it is not the devastating plague it once was to the British farmer. Science, too, has done much towards the eradication of "smut," through the investigations of botanists and the various dressings of the seed now in use. Happily in England rye is not cultivated as a food for man, and the terrible disease caused by ergot does not exist as a danger to our agricultural population. The remaining diseases that afflict plants, which Mr. Ward discusses and illustrates by excellent woodcuts enlarged from microscopic studies, are, unfortunately, more or less rampant, and the radical cure of them is yet to be discovered. Mr. Ward does not indeed profess to suggest perfect remedies. The best remedies known are, after all, mere palliatives, and what this little book supplies is a clear and full demonstration of the chief diseases caused by epiphytes and endophytes, the life-history both of the afflicted plant and the destructive parasite, and the whole process as revealed in cause and effect. Now that this knowledge is an excellent thing may not be apparent to the agriculturist in practice. The student in schools of agriculture, he will argue, may well benefit by the researches of botanists; but he, as a farmer, knows all about the "dressing" of seed-corn from long and sore experience and experiment. The gardener, again, whose whole time is occupied by tending vines under glass, knows how to deal with the pest of "mildew," and is professedly indifferent to the life-history of the specific Peronospora which causes the disease. Plant-cultivation will, of course, tend to become increasingly scientific in the future; but these men are content to leave to coming generations the study and the profit of scientific investigations. The practical cultivator, in fact, is chiefly interested in remedies.

If this, then, is the attitude of the agriculturist, it must be owned it is not unnatural. Let us take as an example the potato disease—an almost universal plague, recurring, with more or less virulence, every year, and at this date as entirely beyond control or cure as ever it was. No farmer or grower could read without some measure of intelligent interest Mr. Ward's admirable chapter on this familiar malady. The ravages of the fungus Phytophthora infestans, from its inconspicuous appearance through all the phases of development, are set forth with excellent exactitude in language that the practical man can have no difficulty in apprehending. Nor are the external phenomena which escape no observer neglected. The extraordinary suddenness with which the disease is manifested soon after midsummer—when the temperature is high, the atmosphere calm and full of moisture, and "thunder" is in the air—is one of the facts known to everybody. The susceptibility of plants in low situations on heavy land, and the frequent escape, during an epidemic, of crops on light soils and elevated positions, are other facts known to all and noted by Mr. Ward. But the cure loudly demanded by the suffering cultivator does not exist—"if," adds Mr. Ward, "by cure is meant some substance which can be supposed applied to the diseased crop, and stopping the progress of the disease." "And yet," Mr. Ward proceeds, "it is astounding how many people seem to be still credulous on such matters." It is the old story. Prevention is better than cure. The remedies are all in the way of precaution. To cut away the haulm—the oldest remedy known—is at the best a desperate remedy, a palliation if done in time, worse than useless if attempted too late. "Start with clean soil, plant tubers absolutely free from dormant mycelium," and lastly, "prevent people who have just passed through badly-diseased foliage passing through a field of healthy potatoes"—such are the three points of good husbandry advocated by Mr. Ward. And no agriculturist ought to need the advice, for it embodies the wisdom of common experience. It is somewhat curious, however, that Mr. Ward has nothing to say of the new experiment in potato planting which has been practised in all parts of the country this summer. Late planting, late enough for the crop to mature and be lifted in mid-September, and in favoured districts in the first weeks of October, has, according to the majority of reports to hand, proved very satisfactory. There has been abundant disease in the early crops, but these late-sown potatoes, owing possibly to their non-development at the critical period when disease is generally active, have for the most part entirely escaped. Here, again, the remedy suggested is but partial, for people will have early potatoes, and the vexed problem yet remains for the solution of scientific investigators.

CELTICISM, A MYTH.*

WERE there never any Celts, or, if something like Celts did exist, were they "shiftless savages"? These are the questions which Mr. Roger settles in his own way, in Celticism, a Myth. He has reached what he calls "the exclusively Scandinavian theory," after passing through a stage of belief in Celtic antiquities and familiar theories. "Let him who will," cries Mr. Roger nobly, "deduce his origin from the shiftless savage of the British isles. I am content to believe myself of that great Teutonic stock which has ruled the world in the past, and will rule it to the end of time." "Thus freely speaketh Mr. Roger of the Celts," as Montaigne, according to Izaak Walton, does about cats. It were a pleasant thing to set Mr. Roger down to argument with Mr. Grant Allen, and let them fight it out. For Mr. Allen's dear Celts, if we understand Mr. Roger, are but a set of degraded Teutons, even in the language which comparatively few of them can speak. But about language we can hardly hail Mr. Roger as an authority. He quotes Pinkerton's doubt as to whether, "in the more remote periods, the Goths spoke Greek, or the Greeks spoke Gothic." This hath a rather antiquated sound, and Darwin can hardly be refuted by a rhyme from Mortimer Collins. He does not even believe that the Celtic speech survives in names of places, where it has died out from spoken language. Now half the rivers and three-fourths of the hills of Southern Scotland are what we call Celtic. What does Mr. Roger call Tweed, Yarrow, Penchrise, the Righ wheel? His theory we gather from a note (p. 22):—"With equal truth might it be affirmed that, where the Northmen never settled, there are no remains of what is called Celtic speech. The Northmen formed colonies in Wales, in Cornwall, in Brittany, in Ireland, in the highlands and islands of Scotland, and in the Isle of Man, and there only do we find those types of obsolete Gothic speech which philologists of the Celtic type include under the Celtic myth." Are the languages called Celtic only obsolete Gothic? If so, was there an invasion of Northmen into Scotland at a date so remote that their language was wholly differentiated from the speech of Northmen invaders of the seventh-tenth centuries A.D.? This we understand to be Mr. Roger's position. For example, Sutherland was invaded, at a remote period, by Northmen, who gave the hills such names as Suilvean and Ben Mohr. These are obsolete Gothic names, and the obsolete Gothic still survives in the vernacular. Then came, say, 700-1000 A.D. Northmen invaders, who gave such local names as the Fleet, Halladale, Helmsdale, and so forth, which are not obsolete Gothic. Or, in the South, the earliest Northmen gave place-names like Penchrise, or Eildon, obsolete; and the later Northmen gave names like Windburg, or Whitecombe. Sometimes both names survive, as in Mull, later Northman, Loch Scavaig; earlier and obsolete Northman—Loch na Keal, the Loch of the Dead Men. This, we are compelled to suppose, is Mr. Roger's theory. There are no "Celtic" place-names, as far as we are aware, in Iceland, which was settled by Northmen. So the "obsolete Gothic" did not become obsolete after 874 A.D. And so Mr. Roger must postdate the presence of obsolete Goths, wherever, all over Europe, he finds Celtic place-names. It is not in nature that people should accept Mr. Roger's or Pinkerton's opinion in preference to the universally held belief that Celtic speech is a language of the Indo-European family of speech, akin to Gothic, Greek, Lithuanian, Sanskrit, but not an obsolete form of any one of these. Mr. Roger considers all these ideas to be, possibly, "but the conclusions of learned ignorance." If Mr. Roger cannot be persuaded, he must be left alone in his scepticism.

If there be Celtic languages, as nobody but Mr. Roger can doubt, there must have been Celts. He himself must, we presume, put in the place of Celts some degenerate descendants of prehistoric Goths. He must get into "pre-history" somewhere, in spite of his rather healthy and amusing unbelief. He is on much firmer ground when he declines to believe in any art or culture that can fairly be called Celtic. The very patterns which are usually spoken of as Celtic are common on the gold work of the Mycenaean graves, which few people, we think, will now place much later than 1500 B.C. The decorated sword-blades, for example, previously held to be unique, have a parallel in a sword from the grave of Queen Aahotep, of the sixteenth century before our era. (Mr. Cecil Smith, in Archaeological Review, July 1889.) At the Ashmolean Museum Mr. Arthur Evans has arranged enlarged copies of Mycenaean and so-called Celtic patterns. It is certainly a plausible hypothesis that the spiral system of ornament won its way North over the tradetracks by which amber was carried from the Baltic to the Mediterranean and to ancient Egypt. At the very least, Dr. Schliemann's Mycenaean discoveries deprive the Celts of any credit for originality in their system of spiral ornament. But perhaps Celtophiles will maintain that the founders of Mycenaean civilization were Celts, or that the system of ornamentation was independently evolved in several places. On their side they might quote the Maori decorative art, but then, unluckily, we know nothing of the original homes of the Maoris, and of their ancient history. If we prefer the principle, in constructing a working hypothesis, of choosing verifiable causes, we must provisionally assume that "Celtic" patterns, which certainly existed on the shores of the Ægean fifteen hundred years before our era, were carried north by trade routes which also existed. If later excavations find the same patterns in the North, in places where they must be older than the Mycenaean graves, it will be time to reconsider the question. Certain it is that the involutions of lines and spirals most characteristic of Irish art were quite familiar in Roman mosaic pavements. Mr. Roger believes this class of art, on British soil, to be Scandinavian, not Celtic. He declines to trace it "through periods of unwritten history which do not help us even approximately to any chronological conclusion." Unluckily for his scepticism, written history with ascertained dates is extremely old in Egypt, and day by day discoveries are helping us to chronological conclusions of more than approximate value. Mr. Roger himself has learned from Hope's Costume of the Ancients that the "Celtic" spiral was familiar to Greece. "Were the Celts the originals of men, and was their art antecedent to that of the Phrygians, Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans?" Probably not even Professor Blackie, or even Mr. Grant Allen, will support this hypothesis. So-called Celtic art merely makes rather exclusive and elaborate use of artistic ideas infinitely older than any Celts about whom we have any knowledge. Mr. Roger is probably right when he claims a Scandinavian origin for the ancient claymores (two-handed), for the Tara brooch, and other brooches, for stone crosses, dirk handles, and what so else is too commonly attributed to Celtic art. "What is Celtic art?" cries Mr. Roger, triumphantly. What, indeed? "The Celts," Pinkerton tells us, "had no monuments, any more than the Finns, or savage Africans or Americans." As to Americans, Mr. Roger can see their bas-reliefs at the South Kensington Museum; but for Celtic art, not derived from the Scandinavians or Romans, we know not where to bid him look. The celebrated "brochs" of the Western Isles were not built by Celts against Northmen, Mr. Roger argues, but by Northmen against Celts, or somebody else. We think he might leave the poor Celts these primitive Martello towers; but the late Mr. Fergusson agrees with him. We can easily imagine Mr. Roger denying that the Celts were worth building even brochs against. Is broch a Teutonic word, by the way, or obsolete Gothic, or what? But when Mr. Roger denies that the Northmen could have used wood "in a country where wood is not to be found," is he not confusing the Mull where Dr. Johnson's stick was a considerable piece of timber with the Mull of nearly a thousand years earlier, when wood may well have been common enough? There are traces enough of adequate trees in the Highlands where now "wood is not to be found."

As to race and blood, Mr. Roger is on perfectly safe ground when he stands up for the large proportion of Northman blood in Gaelic-speaking people of to-day. The Northmen of the Western Isles became Celticized, more is the pity, and we see the result when we contrast the East-coast fisherman with the indolent West-coast man, altered by a Celtic strain, by a relaxing climate, and by an unhappy history. Dean Stanley talked of the Celtic element in Dr. Norman McLeod. Well, in spite of Mr. Roger, there was a Celtic element there, plenty of it, but many of the clans bear Norse names for all that. Mr. Roger quotes Dr. Norman's brother, Dr. Donald Macleod. "My father, Dr. Norman Macleod, senior, who was a well-known Celtic scholar . . . always recognized the Scandinavian origin of the Macleods." But this gentleman adds, what Mr. Roger will not hear of, that the family of the excellent Doctor "had from other sources a very strong dash of Celtic blood." The truth is, we fancy, that the "Mac" names were derived by the clans from their chiefs, who might readily be conquering Northmen, while the majority of the sept were Celts. Mr. John Hill Burton agreed with this opinion. The families at the head of Highland tribes "have generally been found to be of Teutonic race," Norwegian or Norman. Mr. Roger gives a crowd of Macs, prefixed to a Norse name, as MacEwen, MacRannel, MacGill, MacOtter (which would be MacDobhran in Gaelic, we presume), MacColl (Kol), and so forth. In our own opinion, these really were Celts, probably named after animals and plants, salmon and boar, and so forth, who were conquered, Christianized, and adopted a patronymic derived from a Norse chief as their clan name. The process is illustrated in Australia, where a Totem kin sinks its totem and makes the head medicine-man's personal name into a patronymic. Many cases occur in India, and some such change, perhaps, gave us Sons of Kol (MacColls), in place of the older "Sons of the Dog" (McCunns). Thus the Scotch clans would be really Celts, with Norse chiefs, Norse arts, Norse weapons, and even Norse names. But a Celt's a Celt for a' that, in spite of Mr. Roger—a Celt in language, in character, and, with unavoidable mixtures, in blood.

THE SPINAL CORD.*

OUR author records his clinical observations on injuries and other traumatic affections of the spinal cord, states which were originally supposed to be of organic or spinal origin, but are now attributed to a totally different form of nervous disease. It is acknowledged that until very recently published descriptions of the symptoms of spinal injuries have been vague and indefinite; so much so as to be almost valueless in throwing light upon the more obscure questions of spinal pathology and physiology, or even permitting an accurate diagnosis of the cases themselves. Yet such injuries contain a mine of wealth which must advance our knowledge of the normal and diseased action of this portion of the nervous system, and there can be no doubt but that the "experiments" provided for us by traumatic lesions of the spinal cord must, in their turn, illuminate those branches of physiological and pathological science to the growth of which they owe the attention now bestowed upon them.

The marvellous resources of the "antiseptic" treatment allow surgeons to handle the spinal canal and its contents with as little hesitation as the cavity of the skull, the abdomen, or chest. We congratulate Dr. Thorburn on his masterly monograph, and wish him all success in his bold field of work. The volume is very well got up. We suspect the letterpress is somewhat too technical for the average lay reader, though it must prove to him what can be done nowadays for obscure suffering by the scientific surgeon whose knowledge is based upon experiment, analogy, and sound reasoning.

CHESS BOOKS.*

THE literature of the game of chess is increasing in volume as rapidly as any other educational or quasi-educational literature that could be mentioned. It seems as though every proficient in the art, like every young man who gets his first-class at Oxford or Cambridge, considered it necessary to give proof of his quality by writing and printing a brand-new text-book. The practice is a pretty one, in so far as it adorns the individual writer, profits his printer, and leads to a harmless emulation; but one may have too much of it after a time. We cannot see, for instance, why Mr. Gossip, who had already fathered a Chessplayer's Manual and a Theory of the Chess Openings, should have produced another work containing very much the same sort of materials, differently arranged and more concisely stated. The explanatory title of The Chessplayer's Text-Book is "an elementary treatise on the Game of Chess, illustrated by numerous diagrams specially designed for beginners and advanced students." Why an elementary treatise of a hundred and fifty duodecimo pages should contain diagrams specially designed for advanced students is not quite clear. Chess-writers, even of Mr. Steinitz's calibre, think it necessary to comprehend the whole domain of chess in a single volume, beginning with pictures of the men, of a blank chessboard, of the knight's moves, and so forth, and ending with difficult positions, or contests in which they triumphed gloriously over distinguished rivals. It is as though a professor of Latin should try to advance his pupils from mensa to a stiff piece of composition in the course of a few hundred pages. Why does not somebody treat chess on common-sense principles, and publish a primer containing all the necessary elements, with a dozen Giucoco Pianos, carefully annotated for beginners, and nothing beyond that? Such a book would be more educational, as a first introduction to chess, than any other with which we are acquainted. There is evidently no room in an elementary text-book for remarks like the following:—

The foregoing moves occurred in a game between the author and Mr. Crane, the present champion of Australia, who was signally defeated by the author, of whom he was never able to score a solitary victory out of seven games contested in public club matches and tournaments and off-hand encounters.

There is a ring of pugnacious defiance about it; but it is not chess. However, we are far from denying that Mr. Gossip does a great deal for the young player before he addresses himself to proficient. His ten "Hints to Beginners" and his "Preliminary Game" are very useful. They occupy six pages between them, and they comprise just such materials as might have been profitably extended over fifty or a hundred pages.

Mr. Wayte's edition of Horwitz and Kling's Studies and End-Games has undergone a careful revision, and this is now one of the most valuable and interesting books which a chessplayer can have upon his shelves. The first edition, for which the editor wrote a preface in 1884, did an injustice to the memory of Mr. Kling, whose share in the authorship was not acknowledged; and Mr. Wayte appears to have been deceived on this point when he originally vouched for the volume. The matter is set right in the second edition, which includes Kling's name on the title-page, does justice both to him and to Horwitz in a new preface, and supplies a list of more than fifty errata in the text. Mr. Wayte has earned the thanks of all chess students for the trouble which he has taken over this rehabilitation of a favourite text-book.

TWO BOOKS ON AMERICAN HISTORY.†

THESE two books are a part—a small and not the worst part—of the stupendous mass of writing produced, and in course of production, about the brief, and not particularly interesting, history of the United States of America. Mr. Lodge may, perhaps, take this description as one more example of what he calls in his Life of Washington the "stupid arrogance" of Englishmen. But we really cannot help it that American history is dull, consisting for the most part of easy victories won by rather commonplace men, and followed by intensely commonplace prosperity. Round assertion of this kind is undoubtedly a little crude, but there is a time for it. When Mr. Fiske tells us that there was more political faculty in the Convention which drew up the Constitution of the United States than in any body which ever collected in a single room the time is, we think, convenient for flat contradiction. The Convention was an assembly of decent, second-rate men, who had among them one politician who might plausibly be said to belong to the first rank—and he was a Scotch West Indian, whose mother was a Frenchwoman. It had a piece of work to do which might have been spoilt by gross folly and ignorant passion. It did not spoil its chance, and is, therefore, fairly well entitled to the praise of common sense and freedom from mere temper—which, as far as it goes, is respectable. But those who compare the men, the work, the obstacles, and the victory with the great crises of European history can only laugh at such language as Mr. Fiske's. The United States have been immensely prosperous. They have done wonderfully well, if they are compared with the Republics of Spanish America, and have every reason to be pleased with themselves. When, however, one is asked to admire their prosperity as being intellectually and politically great, when we are told to receive masses of details about magnified vestries as being highly instructive, one revolts. There is really nothing for it but to declare roundly that there is more intellect and more politics in any paragraph of Burke or any page of Joseph de Maistre than in the whole constitutional history of America taken together—there is more instruction in the doings of England during any ten years taken at random, or in any generation of the history of Holland between 1500 and 1700, than in the whole mass of American acts and sufferings, from the sailing of the Mayflower till the thrice glorious day when the great Republic was convulsed by the success of a dirty trick played on the British Minister.

Having now made our point of view perfectly clear, as we hope, let us proceed to examine the books of Messrs. Lodge and Fiske. Mr. Lodge, who is painfully anxious that the United States should be American, and not colonial, is, we cheerfully acknowledge, thoroughly American. He has the absolute incapacity to put himself in any but his own parochial point of view, the inability to see that anything was going on in the world except the founding of the great Republic, which distinguishes the historical writers of his nation. Withal, too, he abounds in assertions of the independence and Americanism of Americans while he is showing the most childish sensitiveness to English opinion. He starts in his Life of Washington by referring to Carlyle's famous phrase about the "limited uninteresting sort." He comes back to it, and the "bloodless Cromwell," again and again. He quotes, in an almost abject tone, Mr. Thackeray's comparison between George IV. and General Washington—a piece of claptrap, be it said with reverence, put in to please his audience when the lecturer was going through the States with a piano. In short, like so many of his countrymen, Mr. Lodge displays the most pitiable colonial sense of inferiority at the moment when he is most loudly boasting of his manly independence. This underbred longing to assert oneself breaks out comically when Mr. Lodge has a chance of speaking of the almost solitary grandeur of Saratoga. "'Why,' asked an English lady of an American naval officer in the year of grace 1887—'why is your ship named the Saratoga?' 'Because,' was the reply, 'at Saratoga an English general and an English army of more than five thousand men surrendered to an American army and laid down their arms.'" We wonder if any English naval officer ever thought Long Island or Brandywine worth swaggering about. In truth, Mr. Lodge has an uneasy feeling that what is so all-important in American is a very small part of English history, and is, in fact, forgotten by a people which goes on thinking very well of itself, and caring not one jot what America thinks of it; and this makes Mr. Lodge very angry. As it is with Mr. Lodge, so it is with Mr. Fiske in his account of the years between the end of the war and the establishment of the Constitution. There is in both the same cackling delight over the extraordinary genius of Americans, the same would-be lofty condescension to the dull minds of George and his Englishmen. It never seems to strike either of them that the more completely they show George and his Englishmen to have been stupid, the more they show what an easy business their War of Independence was, and the more discreditable do they make it that the rebels could not win without the active help of France, Holland, and Spain, and the tacit help of Prussia and the Northern Powers.

The two gentlemen are, we will not say sure that they are dealing with great men and great transactions; but they assert it eagerly. The things are different, and manifestly the assertion is not enough. One must have proof. Now that is what neither writer affords. Mr. Lodge, for instance, is very angry with those perverse people who doubt whether Washington was either a great man or even particularly American, and eagerly contradicts them; but when he proceeds from assertion to argument the drop is quite ludicrous. Thus, for example, he is emphatic in declaring that Washington was a general; and so determined is he to prove his point that he calls the Father of the Republic the first soldier on the Continent at the end of the Seven Years' War. As Mr. Lodge is not an arrogant, stupid Englishman, we suppose he does not mean this sarcastic; but it is a sarcasm none the less. What had Washington done to be called the first soldier anywhere at that time? He had been sent by Lord Dinwiddie in command of an irregular expedition against the French at Fort Duquesne, and failed completely. The surrender at Great Meadows was the end of his expedition. He then served as subordinate to Braddock; and, though he fought bravely, as all the English officers did, he certainly did not avert the disaster. From that time forward he was doing frontier work on the Alleghanies—solidly, no doubt, but quite without distinction. No single incident occurred in those years of his service which any human being has cared to remember. If this was enough to make a man the first soldier on the continent, the place was hardly worth having. Mr. Lodge is very angry with the Englishmen of those days who said, rudely enough, that the Yankees were cowards. But, after all, what had the colonists done in the struggle with France to make Englishmen respect their fighting power? Little, indeed. The brilliant things, such as the expedition to Quebec, were the work of English generals and troops unaided by the colonists. We find the same disparity between the claim made for Washington and the evidence produced all through Mr. Lodge's book. He is continually talking of his hero's faculty as a general and superiority to the stupid English, and yet when it came to actual fighting, Lord Howe—no genius, certainly—beat him through and through. If the English, then, were so stupid, what was Washington? We do not say he was stupid, being rich enough not to grudge an enemy his praise, and knowing that after all he won. What we do say is, that he was good man enough to win against very indifferent generals commanding very insufficient armies. This is creditable as far as it goes; but it hardly classes a man with Marlborough or Gustavus Adolphus. At Yorktown Washington had the help of French allies, of an overwhelming superiority of numbers, and of a long course of luck. Of course an absolute fool might have thrown these chances away. Washington did not, and therefore was not an absolute fool; but is it so very great to win the trick when you hold all the trumps, and your opponent is a very average player?

Mr. Lodge is as anxious to destroy the belief that Mr. Washington was "a prig" as to confute those persons who cannot be got to agree that he was a great man. He asserts that this erroneous notion is based entirely on the biography of Mason Weems—the inventor of the famous cherry-tree legend. Now prig is an offensive word and need not be used. We prefer to put "perfect man" in its place, or "limited uninteresting sort," and to ask whether the description is not well deserved. Mr. Lodge has certainly quoted nothing to show that it is not reasonably accurate. He shows that Washington was brave personally, had very definite notions as to what he wanted, and could get very angry when he was thwarted, or when ill-judging persons thwarted the cause. Therefore, says Mr. Lodge, there was nothing commonplace about him. Unfortunately the demonstration seems to us insufficient. It is possible for a man to be brave, clear-headed, and capable of becoming angry, and yet be commonplace. To take him out of that class there must be a note of individuality about him, that "certain extemporaneous spirit and pointedness in his speeches and replies, which always carries its own authenticity therewith, and can never belong to another man," which Harte so justly cited as the internal evidence for the greatness of Gustavus Adolphus. Now it is this extemporaneous spirit and pointedness which, saving the reverence of Mr. Lodge, is so entirely wanting in all that Washington ever said, wrote, or did. His words and acts are honourable and intelligible, they belong to a brave man with an honest intellect, but they want the something at once individual and commanding which is to be found in the words and acts of Cromwell or Chatham, Nelson or Wellington. The hand of these men is never to be mistaken when once known; but if Washington's work were not expressly signed, it would be at all times hard to sift from others. Mr. Lodge's anxiety to prove that his hero was in some peculiar way American seems to us no more convincing. He can only say again and again that Washington was born in America, was brought up there, and worked for its interests all his life. But these things are accidents, not essentials. The question is, whether there was anything in his turn of mind, any flavour in his language, any distinguishing feature in his conduct, which marked him off as belonging to a different nationality from the average Englishman of the corresponding class. If there is, we have never seen it, nor does Mr. Lodge quote it. When he has done his utmost, he has only made Washington look like what many people have thought him all along—an Englishman who happened to be born in Virginia, and had his interests there, whose local patriotism and sense of his personal dignity was strong, and who was always glad of a chance to show that he was as good as a King's officer, who was so far a general that he understood the need of organization, who could recognize a fact, and was not easily led away by phrases. All that is respectable, but it is not greatness, nor will any amount of easy prosperity nor any chorus of applause alter its essential character.

THE poetic gift and the critical faculty are not very often to be found united in the same mind. Were the conjunction more common, we should possess not, perhaps, more accomplished critics, but in all probability better, if fewer, poets. Or, at least, we should do so in every case in which the critic does not kill the poet outright—a contingency which we are bound to admit should not be overlooked. It occurred, we fear, in the case of Mr. Matthew Arnold; it undoubtedly did in that of Coleridge. There is good reason, however, to hope that Mr. Alfred Austin will escape that fate; for, though he possesses critical ability of a high order, he has, on the other hand, so long retained and so recently displayed his poetic powers in undiminished vigour, that we may fairly credit him with having effected a permanent modus vivendi between the creative impulse and the analytic habit. In the preface which he has prefixed to the "new and revised edition" of The Human Tragedy, he discusses the "Position and Prospects of Poetry" in a spirit well worthy either of poet or of critic. That is to say, that while Mr. Austin sets before him what is unquestionably a lofty—some might say an unattainably lofty—ideal of his art, he at the same time shows a thoroughly critical comprehension of the necessity of justifying that ideal to the understanding and of the argumentative process by which that justification is to be effected. We may or may not accept his conclusions, but no intelligent reader can fail to do justice to the skill with which they are presented.

Mr. Austin's theory, if we may put that theory with a brevity amounting to baldness, is this—that, the present age being pre-eminently the age of prose-fiction, just as the age of Shakspeare was pre-eminently the age of the drama, the form in which, beyond all others, contemporary poetry should seek to express itself is that of the Narrative, in one or other of its two varieties, the epic and the dramatic. Lest any one should suppose that this involves the heresy of counselling poetry to follow where it should lead, we hasten to add that Mr. Austin is of course far from recommending the poet to borrow anything of the novelist but his form—and his virtues. He must so far imitate the novelist as to make his story "interesting, and interesting to readers who are alive at this moment," but he must "tell it like a poet, and not like a novelist." It must be accompanied in the telling by "form and music," with "all the glamour which these command and radiate" (and in speaking of form Mr. Austin is careful to signify his recognition of the demand of the present day for a higher "perfection of expression" than satisfied the taste of earlier periods); and, lastly, "if the poem is to be a true reflex of the time, and to retain interest for all time, it must present, by implication at least, together with the individual story, one of those larger issues arising out of Philosophy, Religion, or Politics, which, long of import to mankind and likely always to remain so, haunt with exceptional pertinacity the alert conscience and sensitive intellect of the present generation."

Now we do not deny that The Human Tragedy is in some ways a striking contribution on Mr. Austin's part to the support of his theory. No one can question either the interest of the story, or the fact that the finish of its poetic workmanship is as complete as the difficulties of his task permit it to be; or the stimulating and suggestive fashion of its dealings with the great problems of life which are struck out in the course of the narrative by conflict of character or clash of circumstance. And yet—and yet—we ask ourselves as we close the volume, just as we asked ourselves when we finished the preface, Is Mr. Austin's theory a sound one after all? Is it the fact that a poet does well—we will not say to conform to the spirit of an age in which "prose fiction is universally read and exercises a dominant influence," but to endeavour to compete—for that is what it amounts to—with prose fiction in those special qualities to which it owes its popularity? To feel doubt, and very grave doubt, on this point need by no means imply any questioning of the soundness of Mr. Austin's general proposition that the epic and dramatic forms of poetry, as, in their full development, including and employing all other kinds of poetry, are its highest forms. One may be quite ready to admit that the narrative poem, properly handled, is capable of being made to yield us all that lyrical poetry and all that descriptive poetry can in their own specific forms supply, and that it can give us the results of thought in a far better and more artistic shape than the reflective—or, to call it by its other and more depressing name, the philosophical—poem has ever succeeded in impressing upon them. Nay, one may add the further admission that the narrative poem can "tell a story" as well as the prose romance in the hands of its greatest masters. What Mr. Austin says about the Odyssey and about Romeo and Juliet is perfectly true. No novelist need wish to tell a story of adventure better than Homer tells the former or a love-story better than Shakspeare tells the latter. But to admit all this brings us not a step nearer to admitting that narrative poems should or ought to please, or can without suffering in their poetic character be made to please, because this is "an age in which prose fiction is universally read and exercises a dominant influence." For we have first to ask ourselves what are the qualities in the prose fiction of the age which causes it to be "universally read" and procures it its "dominant influence?" And from Mr. Austin's own account of them it seems that they are confessedly qualities alien to the genius of poetry. In the earlier part of his preface (where he deplors the neglect into which narrative poetry has fallen, and the monopoly of regard which the novel has acquired) he admits that, apart from mere plot-interest, the attraction of the contemporary novelist for the great mass of his readers consists in the "elaborate presentation of human character," not by the synthetic but the analytic method, by "investigation into temperament, qualities, and motives." Another cause of the novelist's popularity is, to put it shortly, his realism—the fact that he simply offers his readers the "literary delineation of ordinary human beings as they are." Yet another fascination which the novel possesses is that it declines to trouble itself with anything more than "the passions and the fate of individual men and women." And Mr. Austin admits, as we have said, that at each of these points the literary processes and the literary material of the poet are entirely different from those of the novelist. There is neither opportunity nor room for the analysis of character in a narrative poem—abundance of both in a novel. The poet, as such, is not a realist, but an idealist who, though he is bound to know mortality as it is, only makes that knowledge subservient to the ideal transfiguration of human nature. And, lastly, the poet is not, as a rule, content with "the passions and the fate of individual men and women," but insists on adding that "something more"—the "arma" as well as the "virum"—which is "precisely what most readers do not want to find treated either in verse or prose, and, least of all, in verse." Yet while thus recognizing these essential distinctions, Mr. Austin, true to his theory of the relation of poetry to the "spirit of the age," has set to work in The Human Tragedy to efface it. Not only does he give us a plot substantial enough to furnish forth a three-volume novel, but he devotes a goodly proportion of his poem to matter which, often genuinely poetic in form of expression, is yet more or less in the nature of the analytic presentation of character; and, while idealizing his story by making it illustrate the play of the great forces of Love, Religion, Patriotism, and Humanity, and dignifying it with the interwoven narrative of such great events as the Liberation of Italy and the Insurrection of the Paris Commune, he has strictly adhered to the principle of keeping the passions and the fate of individual men and women as the never-shifting centre of the spectator's gaze. In a word, Mr. Austin has aimed at vindicating his theory by giving us a glorified three-volume novel in verse, with all the plot-interest and much of the character-interest that a three-volume novel can possess, plus all that higher and wider interest in the drama of human action and the problems of human destiny which the novelist, or at any rate the contemporary novelist, deliberately refrains from attempting to infuse into his work.

Now we cannot think that Mr. Austin has realized his ideal, and it is no idle compliment to him to say that his partial failure to realize it is as good a proof as could be required of its being incapable of realization. Apart from his purely literary gift, the character of his mind and the experiences of his life combine to qualify him better than most men to double the parts of the poet and novelist. But, with all his qualifications and all his skill, he suffers as a poet, and he suffers as a thinker by the attempt to play this double part. Most, no doubt, as a poet; and that, after all, is our main objection. He pleads, and justly pleads, that only "a reasonable and approximate perfection" of form is possible in poems of some length and some variety; that the "Eve of St. Agnes" and the "Pot of Basil" are not, like the "Ode on a Grecian Urn" and the "Ode to a Nightingale," flawless works. But, when a poet who can give us something more than "approximate perfection" of form asks us to be content with that because of the length of his poem, we have to ask ourselves in turn why the poem is long, and whether the causes of its length lead also to other and compensating results. Now The Human Tragedy is long because it has to deal with the life histories of five personages, every one of whom is of importance to the development of the story; because it has to take the reader through a series of great European events; and because the author has to exhibit the play of four of the greatest spiritual influences that govern human affairs. In other words, The Human Tragedy is long because it attempts to do the work of poet and novelist at once. And, being thus long, it cannot maintain itself—it is not in reason that it should—at the level of its best parts; it cannot, for instance—it could not be expected to—sustain the fire and rush of its third act, the "Rome or Death" division of the story. Nor can it, nor could it be expected to, display anything like the rounded artistic completeness of such a work as, for example, Mr. Austin's last production in the order of narrative poetry—Prince Lucifer—a fact which ought to show him, we think, that it is in the poetic drama alone that he, or any one else, can hope to realize, without danger to their art, the aspirations of his preface. There the severity of the form itself is a protection to the poet. But the poetic three-volume novel, we are convinced, is naught. The attempt after it would not really enable Mr. Austin to win over those prosaic "hopeless cases," the lovers of the "analytic novel"; it will only make his poetry less pleasurable to those who can really appreciate it.

REMINGTON'S ANNUAL.*

THE newest addition to the ever-increasing family of Annuals makes an excellent start under Mr. Egmont Hake's conduct with a varied collection of stories, essays, and poems by distinguished and popular writers. The counterfeit presentment of the contributors' signatures, which grace the bill of contents, is a significant index to the wide scope of Remington's Annual. Variety of entertainment, diversity of theme and treatment, people require in a Christmas annual, and variety is abundantly provided by Mr. Hake's company of contributors. In prose and verse they range many fields at will. The short story, the art of the novelist epitomized, is capitally represented. Mr. Walter Besant mingles three fit measures in one cup—humour, pathos, and romance—in his pleasant sketch of a much-engaged lady of an intolerably sanguine disposition. The seasonable note—and what were Christmas without it?—is sounded by Mr. Egerton Castle in his powerful and rather gruesome story of a Hungarian lady, whose cruel witchery is like unto that of the fascinating Geraldine of Coleridge, and by Mr. Walter Pollock's recital of the last exploit of that invaluable "agent," Mr. Peregrine, who provides a private theatrical audience in the nick of time with an original and truly first-night performance of The Rivals by a company that must have been "Sheridan's own." Mr. A. J. Duffield, in an amusing account of the "Naughty Club," embodies a very singular and surprising adventure, told with such persuasive vraisemblance that it should astonish no one to find it portion and parcel of some wondrous past in a future volume of Recollections—of Travels at Home perchance. With these lighter excursions of fancy may be classed various examples of the divine art of poesy—"The Holocaust," by Mr. Austin Dobson, charming and characteristic in style and sentiment; Dr. Hake's grim and literal setting of the text "Let the dead bury their dead"; Mrs. Meynell's graceful stanzas, "A Day and a Life"; Mr. Gosse's sympathetic sea-piece, "The Dead Gull," and the Marchioness of Huntly's musical couplets on the Nightingale. Apart from these is a chant of a fuller and graver strain, a "fable of evolution," by Lord Lytton, with the happy title Sic vos non vobis, wherein it will be found, by not a few, that the author of Lucile has not outworked that fantastic poetic vein in which he first achieved distinction. For other diversions, using the word not in its amusive sense, various aspects of interest may be indicated in Stepniak's account of the Nihilists' plot that resulted in the explosion of the Czar's Winter Palace; Mr. Wesslau's cynical advice to a Parliamentary Candidate; the Bishop of St. Andrews on the genuineness of Mark Antony's friendship for Julius Cæsar, and Mr. Eustace Balfour's exposition of the Kriegspiel, which shows that the "War-game" is a real game, and may be a source of recreation even for non-professional folk. The editorial article, "Pessimism and the Public Conscience," is, in the main, a plea for "rational Political Economy," a political creed which is at present alien to the practice of politicians and of the bulk of the electorate. The strength of Mr. Hake's position lies in his indictment of the Socialistic tendency of much recent legislation, which he demonstrates to be harassing at once and subversive of true freedom, though enacted always in the interests of some one or another distressed section of the labouring community.

NEW MUSIC.

THE London agents of Mr. John Heywood, of Manchester (The London Musical Publishing Company), send us a series of six anthems from the oratorio Immanuel, by William Spark, Mus.D. The first to hand, commencing with the words "This is the day which the Lord made," is a trio, followed by a recitative and chorus, and is a tuneful composition, with quiet and effective harmonies. It is a worthy representative of our classical "Church music," and is well suited either for cathedral or church performance. On p. 162 we cannot help thinking that there must be a misprint in the last chord, and that the G natural has been omitted; for the chord with the sharp as it now stands has no connexion with that which follows—namely, the common chord of C major. "Unto Thee, O Lord," another of the series, has the same quiet charm as the former, but is not very original. "I delight to do Thy will," with the recitative and air "And He arose," has dramatic power. A Christmas carol, "It came upon the midnight clear," is very simple and pretty; we strongly recommend it for a village choir. We are sorry when Mr. Sparks becomes ambitious; his recitative and march, with chorus, "And a very great multitude," followed by "Hosanna to the Son of David," is trite and commonplace. It is curious how the march rhythm taxes the power of an ordinary composer, and always proves a stumbling-block to any one who is not a real genius. Judging from these excerpts of Mr. Spark's oratorio Immanuel, we should advise him not to soar too high and attempt ambitious and dramatic effects; he has a simple charm of his own when confining himself to quiet and harmonious writing. "Sweetheart" is a song sent to us by the same publisher, and is an adaptation of Percy M. Hewitt's "Ma Chérie Waltz." It is of the genus of so-called music which is likely to prove popular. It has a cheerful refrain in valse rhythm, and in another part has an accompaniment suggestive of bells. "Love's Story," by Joseph Spawforth, has the same elements of popularity in a minor degree, the whole being in valse rhythm, and consequently rather monotonous. "Sailing Home," a song by Lindsay Lennox, is commonplace, but has a certain go and spirit. His "Dream Memories," another song, is well adapted to be turned into a valse, which transformation is duly effected by Charles Deacon. It makes a pretty enough valse, but sadly like numbers of others. We suppose this want of variety is to be accounted for by the constantly changing race of ballgoers, and therefore originality is not a necessity. From the introduction of "Breaking Waves," by Harrison Russell, we are led to expect some change, for it begins like a chant. Alas! we are doomed to disappointment, for immediately we get to the tempo di valse our hopes are shattered, and we then find the ordinary, but far from ugly, valse.

* Remington's Annual. Edited by A. Egmont Hake. London: Remington & Co. 1889.

Messrs. Marshalls send us Vol. IV. of The Abbey Original Voluntaries for the Organ, Harmonium, or American Organ, by Alfred Rawlings. Although they are not strikingly original, they have the merit of being melodious, and are sufficiently easy to be useful for performers and instruments of not very high calibre. "A Cossack Dance," by Ivan Tchakoff, is a bright and crisp polonaise, with a great deal of local colour. "Roses Red and White," by William M. Hutchinson, is an ambitious song of the kind dear to the hearts of performers at second-rate concerts. It has a valse refrain, is dramatic in a certain way, and will no doubt prove popular. This we can also say of Mr. Edward St. Quentin's "Honour's Call." It is a patriotic song of the right kind, and has a taking march refrain, which, although perhaps not altogether original, is decidedly inspiring, and sure to be a success at any public meeting. He is much more at home in this style of song than in a sentimental one. "The Friends that could not stay," of this last type, is neither particularly attractive nor pathetic.

CHRISTMAS BOOKS.

IV.

IN one of the addresses to "My dear lads" that preface all his stories for boys, Mr. Henty delivers a little lecture—One of the 28th: a Tale of Waterloo (Blackie & Son)—on the courage of women, "female heroines," and the arrogance of boys who think themselves braver than girls because they are stronger. "For the first time," he says, "a woman is the real heroine" of his story. On the whole, we sincerely trust there will be no repetition of the lecture or the example. Happily, however, a boy is the real hero of One of the 28th, and, like all Mr. Henty's heroes, he is exceedingly lucky as well as brave and good-tempered. The heroine is his mother, and her title to heroism is made out in a somewhat odd fashion. Left a widow with an only son, badly off in this world's goods, she suddenly hears from an old admirer that it is his intention to leave half his property to her son Ralph Conway; the other half to go to a young lady who he hopes will eventually marry the fortunate Ralph. Now this rich and kind gentleman lives with his two maiden sisters, who detest Mrs. Conway, and contrive cunningly to conceal their brother's will at his sudden decease. The old house abounds in secret passages and nooks where once seminary priests and other suspects were wont to lie hid; yet none of these gives forth the will after diligent search. Mrs. Conway is not a lady to be balked of her own. She intrigues a little with her solicitor, disguises herself, and, under a false name, manages to be engaged as a servant by the two maiden sisters. She proceeds, generally under the cover of "dusting" furniture, to survey the premises, and, with a man's clothes, dark lantern, and certain burglarious implements—to wit, a bradawl and thread—develops her dark enterprise. In the end the will is found. She absconds with it to the friendly vicarage under the safe conduct of an ingenuous rustic constable, and all rejoice, save the poor old ladies. A strange kind of lady she is, somewhat after the heroic style of the late Mr. Wilkie Collins; pertinacious, courageous, audacious, beyond all doubt, yet scarcely a dainty heroine to set before the boys. Even Ralph does not quite like it when he hears the story, and most boys will more than echo his doubts. However, Ralph's own adventures in the Channel and on the field of Waterloo are of the most thrilling description; and he, we repeat, is the hero of a story which has two aspects, one of which cannot be said to be admirable in a book written for boys.

If it were not almost as thickly sown with puns as one of Hood's ballads, The Opal Mountain, by Henry Frith (Griffith, Farran, & Co.), is as good a book for boys as one could desire. The story is skilfully developed, the incidents are vigorously described, the sketches of character in boys and men alike are forcible, and the book brims over with marvels. The search for buried treasure in the "Opal Mountain," in some high latitude near Melville Bay, involves a kind of rivalry between two sets of adventurers, much like the expedition of Cooper's Sea Lions, and a succession of perils and wonders, rich and varied enough to satisfy the most ardent lover of excitement. The description of the deserted oil city with its spouting flame and one inhabitant, the account of the voyage to the North seas, the whaling scenes, and other episodes of sport, are uncommonly vivid and striking. One rather incredible circumstance must be noted. The three armed Yankees who surprise the Upton party studying the mysterious chart in the hut should scarcely succumb so readily as they do. And do "road agents" shout "Hands down!" when they suspect a little play with shooting-irons? With hands down you can do much with a revolver. In another place Mr. Frith writes correctly, "Hands up!" Boys who love sporting adventures, with exciting encounters with big game, have a goodly provision for their delight in Major-General Drayson's The Diamond Hunters of South Africa (Griffith, Farran, & Co.) The interest this book arouses is not due to the story, but to the lively accounts of a wandering life in the wilds of Natal and Zululand in which it abounds and the stirring stories of lion and elephant hunting. A new edition of Dr. Goulding's popular story The Young Marooners (Routledge) is prefaced by a brief notice of the author, written by Mr. Joel Chandler Harris. The Young Marooners was written in 1850, and reprinted in England repeatedly since that date. The story thoroughly merits the warm commendation which "Uncle Remus" bestows on it. It is entirely wholesome and has much originality. In The Brig and the Lugger (Hutchinson & Co.) Colonel Walmsley revives with excellent effect the stirring times of the war with France in the days of the Directory and the Consulate, and has not hesitated to introduce the figure of Napoleon himself, though less successfully than Mr. Blackmore in Springhaven. The story, however, is well devised, and the accounts of naval engagements are spirited. At the opening of the story we find "Collot d'Herbois, Barrière, and Billaud Varennes," the second an obvious misprint. The book intended to stir the latent scientific aspirations of youth or to foster inventive faculties and stimulate a taste for mechanics is so frequently marred by a pretentious tone of moralizing and an unseasonable intrusion of didacticism, that it is refreshing to find a book absolutely free from these defects. This welcome novelty is The Modern Seven Wonders of the World, by Charles Kent (Routledge), a book that treats of the steam-engine, the electric telegraph, the sewing-machine, the phonograph, spectroscope, electric light, and telephone in a perfectly lucid style of exposition and with workmanlike thoroughness. For boys no better book of its class have we read. It is well illustrated by over a hundred woodcuts, and will be found full of interest not by young people only.

In spite of recent inquisitions into "what girls read," and the gratuitous advice on the subject occasioned by school plébiscites, the supply, and the average quality of it, appear to be in no way affected. Everybody knows that girls read boys' books, with delight often enough, perhaps also with a feeling of riotous independence. But for very young girls and the schoolgirl in her teens there is ever a fresh supply of stories designed, not merely for their amusement, but primarily for their improvement. The latter show a diminishing tendency in point of number, though there is no reason why they should be less bright and readable than books of a more adventurous strain. For Auld Lang Syne, by Alice Weber (Griffith, Farran, & Co.), has a more ambitious projection of aim and plan than most stories for girls: It is decidedly clever, though it would have proved a more effective story if less spun out. The young people depicted are all more or less interesting, and they are drawn with sympathy and insight. The tortuous course of their love affairs will be found somewhat harrowing by sensitive readers, though the problem presented by the author—the conflict between true love and a lofty ideal of self-sacrifice—is skilfully worked out to the end. Mrs. Meade's Polly, a New-Fashioned Girl (Cassell & Co.) is no exception to the general excellence of the author's stories. It is a thoroughly pleasing story of the trials that befall a large family of motherless children, who are tolerably ungovernable, yet, for all their wayward and exasperating ways, charming by reason of healthy natural gifts. Polly is one of those dreadfully trying children who contrive to be exceedingly entertaining to lookers-on at the game. She takes life seriously, yet makes it look in practice like a very cheering sport. When she undertakes to keep house, then does chaos reign, and the unfortunate family is compelled at length to dine on potatoes. She's all right when you know her, but you've got to know her first. When she is known she will be first favourite in many a house. White Lilac, by Amy Walton (Blackie & Son), is a pretty story of rural life. The rusticity, without any pretence to local colour and dialect, is a genuine element in the story. Village life and gossip, and the day of small things that is often so momentous a day in a country district, are neatly depicted. There is almost as much pother about the naming of the interesting heroine Lilac as there was about Mr. Shandy's heir. The mothers of the village sit in solemn conclave and discuss the preposterous innovation of Mrs. White's choice of Lilac. The scene and the dialogue generally in this pleasant little book are bright and natural. Her Own Way, by Frances Armstrong (Griffith, Farran, & Co.), is a rather placid story of a spoiled girl who resents the arrival of a stepmother, a very harmless lady, and behaves as spoiled children will, till a course of boarding-school life cures her.

Mr. H. E. McLean's "Story of Life Afloat," Andromeda; or, the Maid of the "Golden Age" (Sampson Low & Co.), comprises the adventures of a young midshipman during his first years in the Royal Navy. They are not particularly exciting, compared with the more lavish provision of other writers; but they are forcibly presented, and Mr. McLean's pictures of sea life are tolerably realistic. The "maid" of the story is an American girl who is rescued from a burning ship, the Golden Age, by the officers and crew of H.M.S. Andromeda, among whom the hero is present. This young lady is promptly christened Andromeda, in honour of the event, by her father, and is henceforth known by the hideous abbreviation "Meda." For the rest, the story is made up of much voyaging, during which Harry, the hero, wins his spurs, and in the end is united to the charming "Meda." As a self-willed young person it were hard to find the equal of the heroine and narrator of Cousin Geoffrey and I, by Caroline Austin (Blackie & Son). She is a charming girl, as may be inferred from Mr. Parkinson's clever illustrations, and the way in which she shows her younger cousin how to go the pace on horseback, and in other directions, is extremely exhilarating. She is a fine creature altogether, and her youthful troubles rise to a pretty climax when she takes to circus-work, and is rescued from the burning hippodrome by her old admirer Geoffrey. Miss Austin's story is bright, clever, and well developed. Down the Snow Stairs, by Alice Corkran (Blackie & Son), of which we have a new edition, with illustrations by Gordon Browne, was an old favourite of a year ago, and should not lack fresh readers. In the matter of fairy tales, more than any other form of juvenile literature, youthful tastes are readily formed, and stubbornly unwilling to be reformed. We put the old love before the new, and perhaps for this reason are not greatly impressed by Mr. Ashworth Taylor's Knight Asrael, and other Stories (Swan Sonnenschein). The Story of a Queen, by Mary C. Rowsell (Blackie & Son), offers a picturesque setting of the pathetic story of Marie of Brabant, the queen of Philip the Bold, her patient long-suffering, and final triumph. The choice of subject is rather an odd one to set before children, for stories of poisoning are scarcely edifying. Mrs. Macquoid's Pepin, the Dancing Bear, illustrated by Percy Macquoid (Skeffington), is a delightful little book for children, less amusing than the author's "autobiography" of a dog, but quite as interesting and quite as natural and charming in the telling. From Messrs. Routledge we have received sundry reprints of Fenimore Cooper—The Prairie, Deerslayer, Pioneers, and The Last of the Mohicans, in pretty cloth bindings, with illustrations in colours, and all "arranged for youth." It is hard to say why they are so arranged, and for what "youth" the deed is done.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

M. JULES LEMAITRE is always good reading, whether we do or do not take the very high view of his critical faculties which was—good-naturedly, we hope—opposed here some time ago. And his theatrical impressions are not the worst of his work, though there is, as a rule, little strictly theatrical criticism in them, the drama, and not the actors or the theatre, being usually his subject of interest. Those persons who have chiefly delighted in his littérature personnelle may, perhaps, find less of their favourite buttonholing in this (1) than in previous volumes; for, however stoutly he may argue to the contrary, the censures of M. Brunetière and others seem to have rather had the effect of "drying his vein," as was said (M. Lemaître will not think the comparison a bad compliment) of Corneille. We do not, indeed, think that his article on his own play, Révoltée, is very happy, for a tour de force of that kind must be fort and très fort, or it is nothing. And, without subscribing to the extravagant eulogies of Henri III et sa cour, which have sometimes been uttered—chiefly, it would seem, in order to disparage Hernani—we certainly think that M. Lemaître is unjust in his censures of it—unjust in no very different way from that frequent injustice of the late Mr. Arnold which consisted in refusing to acknowledge the "historic estimate." Again, in the interesting series of articles on the plays of Théodore Barrière, the defects of the personal, untempered or too little tempered by the historic, judgment appear remarkably. Les jocrisses de l'amour, with its satire on sentiment, appeals to M. Lemaître directly, and he "extasiates himself" over it. But when he comes to Les filles de marbre, "cela lui semble presque imbécile." And most imbecile of all seems to him the once celebrated Desgenais. "Cela était de l'esprit il y a trente-six ans! Pauvres nous!" cries M. Lemaître. Now we shall own that, as we read these words of his, a sort of terror came over us, and we put up a prayer for him and for ourselves (which in the liturgy of this particular goddess it is never safe to omit) to Nemesis. For, to tell the truth, having accustomed ourselves for some years to look at things with the detachment which comes of a good deal of study of literature historically, we can perceive a M. Jules—a third M. Jules—saying very much the same thing of M. Lemaître in 1925. The journalist who prattles, who has fougue, and esprit, and cynicism, and a good knowledge of the Paris of his day, and a mixture of buttonholing and literature, who is he that he shall profane the graves of his grandfathers? And M. Lemaître, who is clever enough in all conscience, partly sees this. It is terrible. On the other hand, let us commend the story of M. Sarcey's corruption and fall by a slice of cake at the end of the article on Molière as one of the best things of the kind which we have ever read, and about as like the sickening compound of twaddle and impertinence which our own gutter journalists of the personal kind would turn out on the occasion as Tell or Hofer was like one of Mr. Parnell's Yahoos. We are one with M. Lemaître, again, in some capital remarks which he makes about the work of the glorious triad of Meilhac-Halévy-Offenbach, and he cannot praise "Gyp" too much for us. But his criticism, and still more his remarks, on M. de Gramont's Rolande, seem to us to bring him rather close to M. Ohnet; for saying which M. Lemaître will perhaps try to have our lives. Yet we thank him much for a very pleasant book, and only express a mild wonderment that he should attribute a certain series of scientific experiments recorded by Master Francis Rabelais to Pantagruel instead of to his respected father. O M. Jules Lemaître! is it worthy of a French critic not to know his Rabelais? Refuse to learn English, if you like; quote Shakspeare, and give hardy judgments on him in translations; ignore, at least for the most part, every modern language and literature except French; but at least know that, at least do not commit errors horrific and damnable in it. For, not only was it not Pantagruel, but Gargantua, whose esprit merueilleux was discovered by his invention, after a truly Baconian process, of the best medium for a special purpose; but Epistemon, Pantagruel's governor, would never have allowed it; and Pantagruel's own nature was not in the least inclined to such experiments, even dans son ieune eage. So that the misquoter, unless we misunderstand his reference strangely, has not only misquoted a passage, but shown ignorance of a whole book. "O Monsieur Jules Lemaître! this is very sad to find."

(1) Impressions de théâtre. Par Jules Lemaître. Quatrième série. Paris: Lecène et Oudin.

Three numbers of M. Jouaust's delightful reprints of classics (2) are before us, and we are almost driven to say "Buy! buy!" like antique butchers. The official réclame of the first says:—"On n'achète plus aujourd'hui de Voltaire complet." We hope this is not true. "On ne lit plus," &c., we fear, is true. By trusting M. Bengesco we, who may perhaps boast of knowing something of our "Voltaire complet," can assure both readers and buyers that they will not go wrong. We spoke some time ago of the first part of the new edition of Julie (3), "où," as it might be said in the famous old words, "l'art d'amours est toute enclose," if only Rousseau had been more of a gentleman and less of a valetudinarian and a self-tormentor. The second part now appears, and is worthy of the first. The Contrat social (4) is a very different book, though not perhaps less interesting, at least to political students. It is the reductio ad absurdum of democracy, done once for all, unconsciously, insurpassably. This, it may be well to say, is not the view of M. Jean Larocque. For our part, we should have no hope of an intelligent man who read the Contrat and did not become an ardent Tory. He must have a lésion somewhere.

Three philosophical books of interest complete our list for the week. We have still to ask of M. Fouillée (5), who is "Stephen Leslie"? The inquiry is not impertinent. "Stephen, a Christian name," says M. Fouillée evidently to himself. And "clan," he says, and "Leslie," and "clearly a surname"—which things bear on L'avenir de la métaphysique more than at first appears. There is only one way to a metaphysic, and since Mansel in England, and, perhaps, even Schelling in Germany, folk are out of it. M. Guyau (6), who being dead yet speaketh under M. Fouillée's own guidance in many books, was a clever man, but not a philosopher. M. Bertrand's book (7) is a collection of psychological essays of some interest, especially in reference to Maine de Biran, a too-much forgotten person.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

SCENES from a Silent World (Blackwood & Sons) is the taking title of a series of papers on prison life recently contributed by Mr. Francis Scougal to Blackwood's Magazine. The author is gifted with considerable picturesque power, and is undoubtedly moved by a sincere and ardent spirit of philanthropy. He writes with genuine eloquence on such hackneyed themes as the infallibility of human judgment, the hindrance to the full exercise of moral and religious influence on criminals within the confines of prisons, and the want of some inflexible standard of measuring moral guilt in the various degrees of murder. On certain subjects, such as the present system of prison visitation, it is possible to go far in agreement with Mr. Scougal without being in the least degree affected by the main argument urged in these sketches of prison experience against the efficacy of capital punishment as a deterrent. The proof case of "John Butler" proves nothing more than the fact that the fear of capital punishment did not deter "John Butler" from committing murder in a fit of passion under great provocation. But this is no evidence whatever against the general deterrent effect on the community at large. That is an influence which may be denied but cannot be disproved. On one subject which is an inexhaustible source of weak-eyed sentiment Mr. Scougal utters no uncertain sound when he says "The risk of evil influences to a prisoner within the jail has been greatly overrated." It is unfortunate that a book marked by so much ability and sincerity should be marred by a tone of sentimentality and appeals to the public that tend perilously near claptrap. In one case, after a forcible statement of facts, Mr. Scougal goes out of the way to depict a "dramatic situation," to give a finer edge to his pathos by portraying the interesting "personal appearance" of a murderer, and to draw a ridiculous picture of the burly criminal contrasted with the "small, elderly gentleman" who presided at the trial. This sort of thing should be left to the reporters of the New Journalism.

If not altogether true to its title, Auld Scots Ballants, edited by Robert Ford (Alexander Gardner), is a capital collection of ballads and poems of kindred form. It comprises genuine ballads and the poetic wares of the vagrant chapman; old ballads such as "Chevy Chase" and "Helen of Kirkconnell," and modern examples such as Hogg's most stirring and imaginative poem, "The Witch of Fyfe." Where a choice of versions is possible, Mr. Ford is, so far as we have consulted the book, to be commended, as in "The Queen's Marie" and "Bessie Bell and Mary Gray"; while the selection of chap ballads is altogether excellent. In this division are included rare and notable specimens not accessible to the general reader, such as the delightful "Thrummy Cap" of John Burnes or Burness, "The Blaeberry Courtship," a charming sample of popular song, and the quaint yet very un-Chaucerian "Wife of Beith." Mr. Ford's collection is a book for ballad-lovers to rejoice in as a companion. It is handy in form and compact of all descriptions of popular song, compiled apart from any very lofty critical standard of poetic excellence. The introductory notes are good and sufficient.

Mr. Grant Allen's versatility must long since have ceased to surprise readers of his multiform and multifarious books. In Falling in Love; and other Essays (Smith, Elder, & Co.) we have a number of papers, originally printed in sundry magazines, of a scientific cast, in which the "science" is sweetened to the taste of the numerous section of the public blessed or cursed with a little science. If, as Mr. Grant Allen says, science is "dry" for most people, the sweetening process will certainly be found agreeable to the general taste. There is very little disguise about it. Mr. Grant Allen's treatment is dexterous, his style light and pleasant, his command of the fields of science extensive, and his resources in all that pertains to the "fairy-tales of science" admirable indeed. The result, for those who do not like science and champagne as "dry" as they can be had, is a bright and readable book.

Probably every one interested in the sonnet and its literature is under the impression that Mr. Samuel Waddington is not the originator of the title A Century of Sonnets (George Bell & Sons). Rossetti thought the term had been used and applied by some one. Yet Mr. Waddington says he cannot discover that such is the case. Nevertheless we are not rid of the impression that the title has been employed once or twice before. Both as a writer of sonnets and an authority on the subject Mr. Waddington has done good work. The present collection is worthy of his reputation as a scholar and a poet. His sonnets possess the not common distinction of clearness of expression. They reveal also a sense of form and an avoidance of mere sonority of language that are exceedingly rare in the sonnets of the day.

Psalms of the West (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.) is made up of fluent rhythmical prose in the form of philosophic or religious musings, a little rhapsodical at times, though for the most part strictly meditative. Here is a Whitman-like sample (xlii.):—

I love the common things, and the daily journey is rich in stirring mystery.

To think of them is to be borne on a current of rapture; to behold the actual aright is the opening of the ideal.

It is in this fashion that we are compelled to feel the heavenly superiority of the Psalms of David, just as the sublimity of Genesis is vividly brought home to us by the following Psalm on the beginning of things (xli.):—

In the beginning was the beginning of time, and in the boundless darkness was neither space nor measure.

Of the masses of world there was naught; of the knowledge that they were not, there was no perception.

If a mind had arisen to see, the depth of silence would have slain it with horror, &c.

Of two diverting little volumes by Mr. W. Beatty-Kingston that appear hand in hand, as it were, like the two Dromios on their exit, we prefer the prose sketches, The Chumplebunnys (Chapman & Hall), to the verses, My "Hansom" Lays (Chapman & Hall), though there is plenty of humour in both. The drollery of "The Chumplebunnys" and "Why A. P. lives in Lodgings" is piquant, indeed, and perfectly individual. Nothing so good in its vein have we read since the author of Up the Rhine was alive to make laughter for us. The Lays, written in a "hansom," are often "very gay, very foolish, indeed," as the concisest of critical judgments has it. "A Benevolent Adulterator," "The Four Noble Burglars," "The English Abroad," and the rest, are extremely sprightly. Appended to these sportive examples are some capital translations from the French and German, with some Roumanian renderings that will attract readers not merely by their novelty.

Mr. Joseph Irving's very useful work for reference, The Annals of Our Time (Macmillan & Co.), a kind of "Diurnal Register," fully as valuable as its Annual prototype, is brought down to the Jubilee celebration in the new volume just issued.

Like other documents that offer "revelations" of a nasty kind, Ruby, a novel by Amye Reade (Authors' Co-operative Publishing Co.), is put forth in the interest of truth, public morality, and so forth, though public morality is ill served by the publication of one of the most vulgar, ignorant, and offensive specimens of fiction ever offered for sale in this country.

Some advance sheets, extremely handsomely got up, have been issued by the Clarendon Press, Oxford, of an edition by Lord Carnarvon of certain unpublished letters of Lord Chesterfield, which will make one of the most interesting books of the season. These letters are addressed to his godson and successor, and will fill about three hundred pages. We shall look forward to the book with much interest, and are not surprised to hear that Lord Carnarvon has ended his task with a much higher opinion of Chesterfield than he began it with. All, or almost all, Chesterfield's faults were superficial; some were even assumed; his merits were great and solid.

The enterprising Mr. Frowde, of the Clarendon Press and Oxford Bible Warehouse, has brought out a new set of "Finger" Prayer-books, about the size of a Neapolitan ice, and bound in various pretty and ingenious fashions. To speak truth, some of them—not all—open something hardly; but that is almost unavoidable in a book an inch wide. For portability and elegance they are admirable.

We have received the new volume, the forty-fourth annual issue, of that excellent handbook and directory, The Lawyer's Companion and Diary, 1890 (Stevens & Sons).

We have also to acknowledge new editions of The Animal Alkaloids, by A. M. Brown, M.D. (Hirschfeld); Elements of International Law, by Henry Wheaton, LL.D. (Stevens); Dr. Gneist's History of the English Constitution, translated by Philip A. Ashworth (Clowes & Sons); On the Animal Alkaloids, by Sir William Aitken, M.D. (H. K. Lewis); Law and Practice of Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, by the late George Browne, Q.C., and L. D. Powles (Sweet & Maxwell); and Vol. XXVI. of Bancroft's Works—The History of Utah (San Francisco: The History Co.)

With reference to an article headed "Relics of War" (November 2, 1889), we are informed that the Catalogue quoted from errs in saying that the colours of the 20th were "taken at Minden."

THIS SOCIETY DIFFERS IN ITS PRINCIPLES FROM OTHER OFFICES.

Instead of charging rates higher than are necessary, returning the excess in the shape of periodical Bonuses, it gives from the first as large an Assurance as the Premiums will with safety bear—reserving the whole surplus for those who have lived to secure the Common Fund from loss.

A Policy for £1,200 to £1,250 may thus at most ages be had for the Premium usually charged (with Profits) for £1,000 only; while, by reserving the Surplus, large additions have been given—and may be expected—on the Policies of those who live to participate.

At last Septennial Investigation, notwithstanding the moderate Premiums charged, the SURPLUS declared was £1,051,035. First additions were (with a few unimportant exceptions) from 18 or 20 to 34 per cent., according to age and class. Other policies were increased 50 and 80 per cent.

The system is one specially suited for Family Provisions. It secures for the Premium paid the largest Assurance during the period when a family is most dependent, and it returns the whole Surplus to those who have proved Good Lives.

The Bonuses to Policies participating which became claims last year averaged 49½ per cent.

SEPTENNIAL PROGRESS OF THE INSTITUTION.

NEW BUSINESS.—A steady Home business of over £1,000,000 per annum has been maintained for the last 15 years in succession, obtained at the lowest expenditure.

STABILITY OF THE BUSINESS.

The total Assurances effected have amounted to £27,972,388, of which, exclusive of Bonuses, there are still subsisting £17,542,391. Few offices can show such a record.

THE ACCUMULATED FUNDS EXCEED £6,800,000.

The Government Returns show that, since the passing of Act 1870, the Funds have increased by £4,351,501.

At the end of its Fiftieth year the Directors were able to report that "the new business and the Funds exceeded those of any other Office in the kingdom at the same period of its history"; and in the last Septennium the increase of the Funds was greater than in any other Office. THIS INCREASE was in great measure due to and it is the aim of the Directors to maintain this economy consistently with the efficient conduct of the business.

THE EXPENSES during the Septennium have been under 10 per cent. of the Premium Income, including the usual extra expenditures connected with the Septennial valuation.

The Arrangements as to Non-forfeiture, Free Residence, Loans on Policies (within their value), and early payment of Claims, as on all other points of practice, are conceived entirely in the interests of the Members, there being in a Mutual Society no opposing interests.

ALL POLICIES (not seafaring or military risks, for which special arrangements may be made) are WORLD-WIDE, and free from Restrictions on Residence after five years—provided the Assured has attained the age of 30.

SURRENDER ALLOWANCE.—In the event of inability to continue to pay the Premiums, members are entitled, after three years, to receive on surrender the fair value of their Policies according to a fixed table, or a paid-up policy of equivalent amount. Having regard to the Premiums charged these values compare favourably with other first-class Offices.

Tables of Values will also be found in the Government Returns. An Explanatory NOTE with comparative examples in leading Offices may be had on application.

Members are specially exempt from personal liability. The Society, by special Acts of Parliament, is subject to the jurisdiction of the English and Irish Courts.

THE ANNUAL REPORTS have from its first year contained the fullest information on all matters of importance.

Copies of the Report for 1888, with full Statement of Principles and Tables of Rates, may be had on application.

THE STORY OF THE NATIONS.

Each Volume is furnished with Maps, Illustrations, and Index.

Crown 8vo. cloth, 5s.; PRESENTATION EDITION, cloth, gilt edges, 5s. 6d.; LIBRARY EDITION, cloth, red tops, 5s.

The Guardian of November 20 says:—"There is, perhaps, no surer sign of the increased interest that is now been taken in historical matters than the favourable reception which, we believe, both here and in America, is being accorded to the various volumes of 'The Story of the Nations' as they issue in quick succession from the press. More than one volume has reached its third edition in England alone. . . . Each volume is written by one of the most foremost English authorities on the subject with which it deals. . . . It is almost impossible to over-estimate the value of a series of carefully prepared volumes, such as are the majority of those comprising this library. . . . The illustrations make one of the most attractive features of the series."

PART II. NOW READY.

THE CENTURY DICTIONARY: an Encyclopædic Lexicon of the English Language.

Edited by Prof. W. D. WHITNEY, Ph.D., LL.D., Yale University.

Complete in Twenty-four Monthly Parts, 10s. 6d. each.

St. James's Gazette.—"No pains seem to have been spared to render the work scholarly, accurate, useful, and, for that matter, entertaining; the derivations are as trustworthy as we naturally expect them to be in a work edited by such a distinguished philologist as Dr. Whitney. The explanations of scientific words are singularly clear and concise, and the quotations from authors for the use of words very appropriate and well selected. . . . We have nothing but praise for the way in which the difficulties of such a vast and burdensome enterprise have been surmounted. Let us add that the illustrations are skillfully executed, and that the paper and printing (the latter a highly important matter in such a work) are all that can be desired."

Notes and Queries.—"The scope and execution of the whole, so far as they are seen and are recognizably original, are praiseworthy."

Published in New York by the Century Company.

THE CENTURY for DECEMBER contains "Selections from Wellington's Letters," with Portrait and Illustrations—"Autobiography of Joseph Jefferson" ("Rip Van Winkle"), illustrated—"Friend Olivia," by Amelia E. CLARENDON PRESS NEW LIST.

NEW WORK BY LORD CARNARVON.

To be published on December 10, 1889.

A Limited Edition of 525 numbered copies choicely printed in large 4to. on hand-made paper, gilt top, rough edges, with a Facsimile Letter of Lord Chesterfield's and numerous Illustrations in Collotype, handsomely bound in half-vellum extra, £2 12s. 6d.

LETTERS OF THE FOURTH EARL OF CHESTERFIELD

TO HIS GODSON AND SUCCESSOR.

Now first Edited from the Originals, with a Memoir of Lord Chesterfield, by

THE EARL OF CARNARVON.

These LETTERS of LORD CHESTERFIELD to his GODSON have recently come to light, and they are now printed for the first time verbatim, with all their peculiarities of spelling, &c. They are 236 in number, are full of wit and wisdom, humour and playfulness, and the subject matter is very varied. The Editor in a short Memoir sketches the career, public and private, of the writer, and his remarks on the Earl's Irish administration are naturally of peculiar interest. He sums up:—"I can honestly say that I began my task with little interest, perhaps with prejudice; I have ended it with strong interest, sympathy, and appreciation."

Two portraits of Lord Chesterfield, three of his Godson, Views of Chesterfield House, Mayfair, where many of the Letters were written, and of the old Hall at Breby, together with a Facsimile of one of the Letters, all executed in Collotype, illustrate the Edition.

On and Beyond the Himalayas. By Major-General DONALD MACINTYRE, V.C., late Prince of Wales' Own Goorkhas; Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society. 8vo. with numerous Illustrations, 21s.

"We have read many books on Himalayan, Cashmerian, and Thibetan sport, but none more pleasant, more modest, more amusing, or more instructive." Saturday Review.

"Whether as a story of sporting adventure or as description of little-known regions, 'Hindu-Koh' is eminently readable. General Macintyre has made any number of expeditions to the abode of snow, and can give the very cream of a life-long experience."—St. James's Gazette.

"So great is the variety of range and subjects in this volume, that we have been able only to indicate, not fully describe, its character; and we lay it down with that feeling of satisfaction which is imparted by something well done, and the sense of clear gain."—Spectator.

LORD MELBOURNE'S PAPERS

Edited by LLOYD C. SANDERS.

With Preface by Earl COWPER.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"Readers of this volume will find in it much that is new and more that is interesting. We commend it to the perusal of political students, with a word of justly-earned praise for the modesty and self-effacement with which it is edited."

THE TIMES.—"This selection from Lord Melbourne's papers, which has been judiciously edited and illustrated by Mr. Sanders, being almost all of it new, throws considerable light on the character of a man, who, as statesman and politician, is still something of an enigma, and has possibly been much misunderstood. The book is all the more readable for its relative brevity. The specimens of his letters and of those that were written to him are sufficient, for they happen to touch on the subjects in which we are naturally most interested, and they illustrate all the successive stages of his career."

THE BADMINTON LIBRARY—(New Volume).

Edited by the DUKE OF BEAUFORT, K.G., and ALFRED E. T. WATSON.

The LIFE of LORD JOHN RUSSELL.

By SPENCER WALPOLE, Author of "A History of England from 1815." With 2 Portraits. 2 vols. 8vo. 36s.

"Throws more light on the inner working of politics than any book which has appeared of recent years, if we except, possibly, the last instalment of the Greville Memoirs. It will rank with that work and with the biographies of Palmerston and the Prince Consort, as one of our chief sources of history for the middle of the nineteenth century."—Spectator.

the ANGLO-RUSSIAN QUESTION. By the Hon. GEORGE N. CURZON, M.P., Fellow of All Souls' College, Oxford. With Illustrations, Maps, Appendices, and an Index. 1 vol. 8vo. 21s.

"The candour and moderation, not less than the bright and sometimes eloquent style of the book, make it welcome to the student jaded with the drier as well as the more impassioned aspects of Central Asian affairs. The book is profusely and capably illustrated, and the maps are good."—Spectator.

TRADE-UNION TYRANNY.

IT is possible that the parallel disputes between the South Metropolitan Gas Company and the Gas-Workers' Union and between the Maxim-Nordenfelt Company and the Amalgamated Society of Engineers may serve to bring the "wages" question to a crisis. It is called the wages question by a figure of speech; but, in fact, it is in many cases a trial of strength between the employers of labour on one hand and the Union wirepullers on the other. If one wanted to define the disputes named accurately, it could not be better done than by saying that they are the very reverse of the kind of quarrel sketched by the Secretary of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers in his letter to the Times on the 5th of this month. This person ends by saying, with some unction, that the Society has "no objections to the Maxim-Nordenfelt Company or any other employer being masters of their own shops; but it will be a sorry day for Britain when the workmen of this country give up the right of combination with their fellows, and of the terms and conditions under which they will work and dispose of their own labour." We need not question the Secretary's grammar, since the meaning of his words is clear. It is, we allow, true that it would not necessarily be a good thing for the country if workmen ceased to exercise the right of combination, and became so incredibly careless as not to care on what terms they sold their labour. Nothing, that we can see, would be gained by the permanent fall of a large part of the population into a state of idiocy. Their work would suffer in every way, which would not be a good thing for the community. But, as a matter of fact, it is not this right which is in question, but quite another thing.
